Various Materials Used In Road Construction

Rubber Cures Hardness

"Perhaps the most successful use of rubber for roads is its substitution for asphalt joints between sections of concrete. Two years' trial in New England indicates that rubber joints take up the expansion of concrete better than does asphalt, accumulate less water, and eliminate the rhythmic, over-the-waves bumping caused by projecting asphalt strips.

"Elsewhere roads are growing harder instead of more rubbery. Aluminum highways have provided Germany with smooth riding, with the added advantage of helping the light problem with their higher reflecting power. Powdered aluminum, mixed with the usual surfaces of tar or asphalt, prevents to some extent the softening of those substances during hot weather.

"A new Iron Age has been ushered in by Paris, where cast iron plates of different types have been laid along an avenue to test which kind is more durable. Already the iron plates are hailed as hardly more expensive than granite, and fifteen times as lasting as granite.

"The Province of Mysore, India, has sweetened the lot of the traveler by spreading molasses over its roads. Mixed with surface soil, molasses sheds rain and curbs dust.

Efforts to try new highway materials have developed unusual mixtures, such as soap with asphalt. One process solidifies sand into solid ground by chemical treatment.

"Roads are made of whatever material is most plentiful in the neighborhood—oyster shells, crushed slate, crushed marble. West Virginia and Colorado have roads built of gold, or at least of material containing a low content of 'pay dirt.'

"A tin can road was provided in Georgia when an engineer dumped old tin cans on a road in construction, ran the steam roller over them, and packed sand and soil on top.

"Such unusual road surfaces are no stranger today than was the early macadamized covering, when the United States gave it a tryout on the old turnpike in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Philadelphia. Concrete for a road, an idea that startled the country not forty years ago, was given a gingerly trial in Bellefontaine, Ohio—just one block. Now both surfacings are used extensively, as are asphalt, tar, stone, brick, wood, and gravel."

NY Plans Campaign To Fight Snowfall

Million Dollars Worth Of New Equipment Purchased; Unemployed Labor Conscripted

Mindful of last year's snow and ice blockades, New York City already is preparing for winter's blizzard under the reorganized Department of Sanitation, headed by William F. Carey. Prompted by Mayor F. H. LaGuardia, the Board of Aldermen has authorized $1,000,000 to buy new snow removal equipment. This appropriation was made after much discussion of Mr. Carey's request for $9,000,000 worth of equipment for year-around street cleaning, and $2,000,000 for snow removal.

Approximately two-thirds of the new snow equipment will be delivered by January 1, it is estimated, the city believing that the present facilities will be enough to cope with the comparatively light snowfalls of December. New York's worst winter weather comes after New Year's. One of the worst recent storms fell on January 19, 1936, with six inches of snow followed by days of near-zero temperature. Experts believe it may be several years before such adverse conditions recur, but the Department of Sanitation wants to be prepared.

Plows Clear First Passages

The first move after a snowfall is to clear a passage in the streets, for which the city has a variety of plows. The most effective units are twenty ponderous wreckers, used in ordinary weather for bringing in disabled trucks and sweepers.

The wreckers have steel plows with blades six feet high and twelve feet long to buck drifts, and surface ice-scrapers below. The department also has fifty-two rotary broom units for lighter snow deposits and 425 flushing machines to which plows can be added. The 926 collection trucks also carry plows. Between December 11 and February 15 the city will get 400 new trucks equipped with snow plows.

300 Small Units Ordered

As the plow-equipped units work up the main avenues, they pile drifts on the crossings. To clear them the city has 207 special plows, small and powerful, with 300 more ordered for this winter. It also has special road scrapers to remove the ice.

Speed in clearing the streets after the plows have cut traffic lanes is important. If the temperature is well above freezing, water can be used to a limited extent in melting snow masses. But conditions rarely are favorable for such an easy solution.

Ordinarily the snow must be piled and then carted to a riverfront. This seasonal occupation long has been a winter boon for the needy.

Mechanical loaders also are used to load the carts. The city now has 127 of the escalator or endless chain type, and has contracted for 111 new loaders.

Mayor LaGuardia and the Board of Aldermen were long at loggerheads as to what kind of loaders to get. The appropriation was finally split to buy sixty-eight of the escalator kind, as the Aldermen prefer, and forty-three of the more rotary variety that the Mayor favors. This latter type has revolving blades which draw up the snow and pour it through a swanlike neck into the carts, says the New York Herald Tribune. Even with the 238 loaders, old and new, the department maintains that the city will not be prepared for good resistance to the elements until it gets all the apparatus it proposed.

Civil Service Labor

There will be an improvement in the extra labor to be recruited for snow removal. From the civil service lists have been selected 2,442 truck drivers from twenty-one to thirty-one years old, who will be called when the first heavy fall comes. This is the first time the civil service will supply snow removal labor. The drivers are undergoing tests on their ability to drive under emergency conditions.

For shoveling labor the department has registered 20,445 men from twenty-one to fifty years old. The registration took place at 226 stations throughout the city with the cooperation of welfare, charitable and relief agencies. Only those were accepted who seemed strong enough to stand up under the work and the weather. On each registration card is a small photograph of the registrant, a duplicate of which is on file to prevent transfer of the cards.

Tiny New Magnet Gives Vast Power

efficient for the purpose. A new type of gas 'transmission line' was developed which gives the impulse method of ion acceleration considerable promise.

"Incidentally, the study of the above gas 'transmission line' has afforded a possible insight into the mechanism for the propogation of the lightning flash."

New Tests for Earth's Age

Further refinements in methods for determining the age of the earth which promise for the first time to establish reasonably accurate dates for the various geological periods were reported by Dr. Alfred C. Lane, Emeritus Professor of Geology at Tufts College, Boston.

Much progress has been made recently in studies of the earth's age by determination of the rate of decay of the radioactive rocks containing uranium and radium, and their disintegration products, consisting of a special type of lead and of helium gas. Uranium and radium disintegrate at a definite rate which has been found to be constant under conditions.

But whereas uranium has a half-life time of 4,500,000,000 years, radium has a half-life time of only 1,700 years.

"If you have a definite quantity of popcorn," Dr. Lane stated, "and you know the rate at which they pop, you could tell by counting the kernels that have not yet popped how long the popping process has been going on. Similarly, you can determine the age of the earth by determining the amount of uranium that is still left and comparing it with the amount of the special form of lead into which the uranium has disintegrated."

Since it takes uranium 4,500,000,000 years to disintegrate to half its original amount, Dr. Lane stated, the finding of an equal amount of lead with the uranium would indicate that the earth was 4,500,000,000 years old. Actually, it is found that only two-tenths of the uranium has disintegrated into lead. The shows that the earth is about 2,000,000,000 years old.

Helium Gas From Radium

Radium, on the other hand, gives off helium gas, as it turns into lead. In rocks not too close to the surface this gas is retained. With the rate of disintegration known and compared with the amount of helium gas found, the age of the rocks can be determined.

The older rocks have more helium than the younger, whereas the amount of radium in the older is not much different from that in the younger rocks. By measurement of the difference in helium content, the difference in age between the older and younger rocks may be determined.

By applying this method, Dr. W. D. Urry of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has determined the age of certain rocks at 1,090,000,000 years.

A new mathematical theory of chemical reactions, which attempts to explain the reason why certain chemical elements combine with one another to form the infinite number of chemical compounds in nature and in the laboratory, was presented by Dr. Henry Eyring, Associate Professor of Chemistry at Princeton University.

By figuring out the distances separating the various atoms and their energy levels it becomes possible in some instances to predict how they will behave. Extension of the work, it is hoped, will make it possible for the chemist to figure out by mathematics how to produce new compounds and how to reproduce synthetically in the laboratory essential compounds existing in nature.

The work, however, is still in an early preliminary stage.

A new apparatus for the concentration of "heavy carbon," which has an atomic weight of thirteen instead of the twelve of ordinary carbon, was reported by Professor Harold C. Urey of Columbia University, who won the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for his discovery of "heavy hydrogen," with an atomic weight twice that of ordinary hydrogen.

Concentration of the heavy carbon is a very difficult process, Dr. Urey explained, but with improvement in the apparatus it is hoped to produce amounts a thousand times greater than that obtained by present methods.

ENTERTAIN AT EGG-NOG PARTY

Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Boyce entertained a large number of friends Friday at an egg-nog party at their home at 6 Hinoki-cho, Akasaka-ku.

NOW IN TOKYO

Captain C. R. Boxer, who was a language student at the British Embassy several years ago, is now in Tokyo on his way to Hongkong. He is spending a few days as the guest of the Dutch Minister, General J. C. Pabst.

Captain Boxer is a student of Dutch and the author of the book Jan Compagnie in Japan, which deals with the Dutch activities during the early Tokugawa Period. Captain Boxer is travelling with his sister who is also staying at the Dutch Legation.

YOKOHAMA NEW STREET CARS

The Yokohama Municipal Electric Bureau recently built five large modern street cars for the accommodation and comfort of the passengers. Inside the car there are six cushioned chairs to accommodate 12 persons. On the other side of the car there is a long seat running the length of the car. The accommodation limit of each car is 95. These cars are to be tentatively placed on the lines in Yokohama from January 1.

RETURNED TO JAPAN

Mr. Geoffrey Oram of the Rising Sun Petroleum Company, Yokohama returned to Japan from a six months' trip in England today by the Empress of Canada.

DESCRIPTIVE BROCHURE ON VIEW

The British consulate has on view a descriptive brochure issued by the London Times containing a small facsimile of the painting by Frank O. Devaluation Aids Swiss Business even lowering, of the present level. With a quick appreciation of the needs of the hour, the Federal Council decided to render far more supple the existing regime of restrictions. Certain quotas must be abolished, and certain tariffs cut. These measures have a regulating effect on the economy of the country, and it is hoped that there will be stability of prices and wages. The benefits of a momentary speculation in acquired stocks would be nothing compared to the permanent benefits to be derived from the new stimulus to trade. Happily, even those who have not given much thought to economics realized the need of co-operating, and it would seem that the transition from the old to the new franc has been accomplished without undue difficulty.

Benefits Accruing

Each class of the population has seen where its true interest lies. The shopkeeper has seen that it is not in higher prices but in larger sales. The manufacturer has seen the opportunity of selling abroad again. The hotel keeper is anxious to welcome the visitor in greater numbers. The workman understands that a sudden rise in wages, which would mean a corresponding rise in prices, would not enable him to purchase more, and would leave the problem of unemployment where it is today, whereas an acceptance of the new conditions should mean a massive decrease of unemployment.

So that those who refused to envisage the possibility of devaluation, instead of indulging in idle criticism when it was decreed, rallied round the Government in order to make the most of the opportunities of economic recovery of which Switzerland, as much as any country in Europe, stands in need.

Whimsy Shows Under Troubles In Poe's Letters

to try and borrow $3—so that I may have a fortnight to go upon. I feel in excellent spirits and haven't drank a drop so that I hope—to get out of trouble. The very instant I scrape together enough money I will send it on" . . .

Another to Mrs. Clemm, whom he affectionately called "Muddy";

. . . "I lectured at Norfolk on Monday and cleared enough to settle my bill here at the Madison House (Richmond, Va) with $2 over. I had a highly fashionable audience but Norfolk is a small place and there were 2 exhibitions the same night." . . .

Apologies for Some Drinks

The whimsical touch becomes apparent particularly in a letter Poe wrote from Philadelphia to two friends. When last he had seen them, Poe evidently had indulged too freely. He wrote:

". . . please express my regret to Mr. Fuller for making such a fool of myself in his house, and say to him (if you think necessary) that I should not have got half so drunk on his excellent port wine but for the rummy coffee with which I was forced to wash it down." . . .

A puzzling bit of the collection is a Valentine poem, written in 1846 and signed "E. A. P." Library officials believed the poem never had been published. It reads:

"For her these lines are penned,
whose luminous eyes,
Bright and expressive as the stars of Leda,
Shall find her own sweet name that, nestling lies Upon this page, enwrapped from every reader.
Search narrowly these words, which hold a treasure
Divine—a talisman, an amulet
That must be worn at heart.
Search well the measure—
The words—the letters themselves. Do not forget
The smallest point, or you may lose your labor,
And yet there is in this no
Gordian knot
Which one might not undo without a sabre
If one could merely understand the plot.
Upon the open page on which are peering
Such sweet eyes now, there lies,
I say, Perdu,
A musical name oft uttered in the bearing
Of poets, by poets—for the name is a poet's too.
In common sequence set, the letters lying,
Compose a sound delighting all to hear—
Ah, this you'd have no trouble in descrying
Were you not something of a dunce, my dear—
And now I leave these riddles to their seer."

The hidden name Frances Sergeant Osgood, one of Poe's contemporaries, says the New York Herald Tribune, is revealed by taking the first letter in the first line, the second letter in the second line, and so on through the twenty-one lines.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

Reich Decree Bans All Art Criticism

Writers Hereafter Will Not Blame Or Praise, But Merely Give Description Of Work

Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Propaganda Minister, announced on November 27 that in future all criticism of the drama, films, literature, painting, sculpture and other art works would be prohibited. The ruling applies primarily to published criticism but evidently it applies also to the radio and the platform, says the New York Times.

Writers are neither to praise nor blame. They are not to express any opinions. Their sole duty is to give a "description" of the work with which they are dealing.

This decision, announced at the annual festival sitting of the Reich Cultural Chamber, is the upshot of a long quarrel between the National Socialist regime and the dramatic, film and art critics, the last of the German journalists and publicists who occasionally expressed opinions contrary to those of responsible National Socialist functionaries.

Dr. Goebbels, in opening his address, said;

"I do not intend this year to report the details of the Reich Cultural Chamber's work in order to demonstrate the unhalting victory march of our cultural life. Our steady progress is so clear to every man that it hardly needs comment.

All Efforts Have Failed

Professional observers of this program, however, appear to have been of a different opinion. Even in the National Socialist press they have often been damned with faint praise.

"These conceited know-it-all gentlemen," Dr. Goebbels said today, "who through their everlasting quarreling constitute an off-chorus in our cultural and artistic life are merely heirs of the Jewish critics' autocracy.

"We employed every means to bring the critics to their sole and proper role of art observation, giving them with it the possibility of continued existence. All these efforts have failed. It sometimes looked as if all the scolds who could no longer exercise their faculties in other fields centered on the arts.

"We had to call a halt. I therefore found it necessary in the decree announced today to forbid all criticism and replace it with art observation or art description. That does not mean the limitation of free expression of opinion.

"We have often experienced in Berlin the spectacle of 22 and 23 year old boys taking 40 or 50 year old artists to task without being able to show a sign of technical knowledge. They will now learn to describe art work. That is also difficult and it must be learned. If a critic feels himself capable of more than that, we are looking for capacities in many artistic fields and he is welcome to undertake positive work."

The usual hints as to the type of art the regime prefers were scattered throughout the speech. The Minister said:

"Today's German artist is a serious and industrious being wholly awake in heart and soul to our national political existence. In separate chambers of the Reich Cultural Chamber he is trained to accept discipline and feel esprit de corps and professional pride.

"I speak in the name of all artists when I express in profound awe our burning gratitude to the Fuehrer. In these last years in which anxiety and labor certainly have not been spared him he has reached out his protecting hands over Germany's artistic life."

The decree suppressing criticism provides so far as the press is concerned that every "art and editorial worker" must have a special permit from the Reich Cultural Chamber and from the Reich Press Chamber, must be 30 years old and must have undergone certain previous training.

Despite his opening promise not to discuss the details of Germany's "triumphant cultural progress" during the last year, Dr. Goebbels did devote much of his address to a detailed review of all the fields in which he asserted great progress had been made.

Referring to the films particularly, he declared:

"German films, once the domain of Jewish and Marxist intellectuals, passed last year their great test, producing genuine masterpieces."

The masterpieces evidently failed to appeal to the German public. A notice appearing in the German press and never denied stated that the German film industry lost last year some 9,000,000 marks.

Mild Fall Helps Soviet Cotton Crop

States last year, she is increasing purchases of other goods, chiefly specialized machinery and machine-building equipment, so she will not only live up to her trade agreement to buy $30,000,000 worth of American goods a year but will handsomely exceed it.

During the first nine months of 1936 there has actually arrived in Russia $35,000,000 dollars worth of American goods, against $21,000,000 worth in the same period last year. At the same time the Soviet's sales to the United States have declined from $21,000,000 to $15,000,000.

Germans Warned To Eat Less Fat

Food Commissar Indicates He Will Force Nation To Turn To Sugar And Potatoes

Col. Gen. Hermann Goering's Deputy Commissar for Food Control under the four-year plan, State Secretary Herbert Backe, informed Germans on November 28 that they were still eating far too much fat for the Fatherland's good, and indicated measures were to be taken to limit their diet, says the New York Times.

At the same time immediate and future regulations were announced that will curtail the business of most German liquor distilleries to save for food all the grain and potatoes they consume.

Deputy Commissar Backe declared:

"It is absolutely intolerable that the consumption of fat per capita today is 24 per cent higher than in 1913. Here is, evidently, an opportunity to reduce the fat import balance. Fat can be replaced without injurious effects by carbohydrates. Besides sugar, of which there is plenty, Germany has its cheap potatoes as a source of carbohydrates. The consumption of fat on farms can also be reduced without harming any one."

Sees Error in World War

The assertion also was made that of the Germans during the World War "had had the right attitude" they would not have succumbed to the hunger blockade.

The occasion of this outburst against the nation's slow response to the government's appeal to pull its belt tighter was the annual Peasants Congress under the presidency of Richard-Walther Darre, Agriculture Minister.

The most significant aspect of Mr. Backe's address is the impressive evidence that Germany means what she says when she undertakes to disappear as a customer on world markets for foodstuffs and become self-sufficient. No secret is made of the Reich's determination to turn the clock backward a hundred years and start on a new line of economic development.

"If the nation is to be sure of its existence," said Mr. Backe, "we must make up for the oversights of the last 100 years. We must begin at a point where the organic development of a closed national economy was interrupted by liberalistic economic tendencies.

"Those principles, which were decisive for German economy in the pre-liberal period, will again come into action. These principles are increased domestic production, the accumulation of reserves and a new attitude of the individual toward his economic activity.

"Today an increase in domestic production is easy, for the impossibility of securing goods on world markets is the best possible protection for the policy of increased national production."

Program Is Described

The program by which the Third Reich intends to become self-nourishing was sketched in considerable detail. Low land will receive drainage systems. More acres are to be won from the 3,000,000 acres of waste land.

Thirty per cent of Germany's farm lands which are devoted to pasturage will be turned over wherever possible into cultivated fields to procure a more economical, larger supply of fodder. The Reich has undertaken to subsidize the construction of silos throughout the country.

A warning has been given to farmers to plant according to the country's needs, not according to their desire for crops that will prove most profitable.

"In the future," Mr. Backe warned, "drastic action will be taken against those persons who believe they can increase or decrease their planting according to prices. It is evident that land cannot be withdrawn for private commercial reasons from the production of vital importance to Germany and be devoted to vegetables and fruit."

A program for rural electrification also was promised.

Indignation Meetings In Soviet Demand Action

Domei

MOSCOW, Dec. 22—Determined action to check provocations by the Spanish Fascists was demanded at indignation meetings held throughout the Union today in protest against the recent sinking of the Soviet motorship Konsomol by a rebel warship off the coast of Spain.

Large crowds of workers attended the meetings where speakers denounced the act as a "piratic crime" and called upon the Government henceforth to ensure the safety of Soviet vessels navigating in Spanish waters. They also urged a further strengthening of the Union's defenses.

TEA AT THE SCHOOL OF JAPANESE LANGUAGE AND CULTURE

The School of Japanese Language and Culture at 3 of 9 Shiba Park, Shiba, has a special department for foreign-born Japanese which, it is felt, is not very well known. Therefore the school is holding a tea at the school at 3 p.m., Friday, January 8 to introduce this department and the new school building.

Besides brief addresses by the principal, Mr. Darley Downs and the dean, Mr. Yahei Matsumiya, Mr. E. W. Frazar, one of the school's original trustees and well known to most as the Vice-President of the American-Japan Society, hopes to be present to speak, also Mr. R. L. Durgin of the Y.M.C.A. and the Nichibei Kyokai special committee on activities for "nikkeibeijin."

In order to offer work by regular teachers at one-half the normal fees, it is necessary to hold the classes in the afternoon from one to four. However, work at regular rates can, of course, be arranged. Fees are ¥15.00 a month for three hours a day. Full explanation of the language and cultural courses will be made at the tea; or, if that is inconvenient, personally by the principal or dean at the School at any time after January 6.

The School began its work for foreign-born Japanese about four years ago and has had some sixty or seventy students, among them Mr. Ken Murayama and Miss Fify Mizuguchi, officers of the newly organized "remmei." Miss Mizuguchi has spoken very highly of the methods used here especially for the first attack at the language after coming from abroad. As with the other students, she appreciates the plan of small classes with consequent increase of individual attention and the provision of special cultural course. In the new building with its large and attractively furnished students' lobby, it is believed that the School should become a very pleasant social center. All foreign-born Japanese are cordially invited to attend this tea.

Soviet Completes Strategic Railway

Vital 2,000-Mile Line Across Siberia To New Industrial Center And Port Opens

Readiness of the Soviet in the Far East, which Joseph Stalin has described as "one of the hearths of war," was proclaimed by G. N. Krutoff, president of the executive committee for the Far Eastern region, at the November 27th session of the Congress of Soviets, meeting in the Klemlin Palace, according to the New York Times.

He made a great impression on his auditors by announcing the completion nearly two years ahead of schedule of the new main line railway across Siberia to Komsomolsk. That new industrial city, 125 miles north of the Manchoukuoan border, at Khabarovsk, was built from nothing in a wilderness in a few years by Communist youth and is said to be destined to overshadow Khabarovsk and Vladivostok as the metropolis of the Soviet Far East.

(The new line, called the BAM, or Baikal-Amur Magister, is about 2,000 miles long. It branches northward from the Transsiberian Line at Taishet, east of Lake Baikal, and runs north of that lake, through important iron, coal and gold regions, to Komsomolsk. There it divides into three branches, one going northward to Nicolaievsk, another westward to a new port the Soviet is establishing and the third southward to Khabarovsk and the Transsiberian. It is understood to be a double-track line.)

Industrial Center Ready

The new railway line—coupled with the new industrial center and port, which are complete, even to shipbuilding plants—has great strategic significance. Mr. Krutoff for the first time revealed that a train had already run direct from Moscow to Komsomolsk.

"We see Japanese imperialists preparing for war against the U. S. S. R.," said Mr. Krutoff. "The policy of the Soviet is peace, but we warn frankly that if there is an attack we, on the basis of the Stalin Constitution, will deliver a crushing blow and will not give up an inch."

Just as Mr. Krutoff spoke of the Soviet Far East's readiness for defense, General Vassily Bluecher, commander of the special Far Eastern Red Army, walked into the hall and took his place on the presidium, having just arrived from Siberia. He had to stand several minutes with spotlights playing on him while the congress gave him a tremendous ovation.

A delegation of fifty workers from the munitions plant at Tula filed into the congress and presented to Stalin the latest model of snipers' rifle and to the congress itself a machine gun as symbols of their part in building up the "Socialist fatherland's" military strength against attack.

"Tula never forgets that it is its job to supply the Red Army with munitions," said the delegation's spokesman. "We will do our best so that our weapons will pierce the hearts of our enemies. We will strive to make our arms better than any made in capitalist countries."

A composite company of picked Soviet soldiers, representing infantry, artillery and the aviation and tank corps, smartly marched into the hall, preceded by blaring trumpeters. The men stood at attention while their commander declared to the Soviet leaders massed on the platform the readiness of the army to defend the Soviet Union and its new Constitution to the uttermost and its confidence in its ability to smash any enemy, not on Soviet soil, but on the invader's own soil.

Defense Is the Theme

In between these two visual manifestations of the seriousness with which all types of Soviet citizens, from the highest to the humblest, are viewing the war danger was sandwiched a scholarly address by Andre Vissinsky, chief prosecutor of the Soviet Union, contrasting Soviet democracy as expressed in the Stalin Constitution, which will be adopted in a few days, with bourgeois democracy to the disadvantage of the latter.

But the dominant theme of the Congress of Soviets today, as yesterday, was approaching war and confidence in the Soviet's might against any combination of enemies.

All day and all evening spokesmen for delegations from various parts of the Soviet Union, frequently actual workers, dwelt on this theme in speeches from the same rostrum from which Stalin two nights ago delivered the draft of his new Constitution.

"We need steel for our enemies—better steel, hotter steel," said a worker from a Moscow steel plant.

"We are going to teach our children to hate and fight fascism," said a Moscow school teacher, amid cheers.

A Leningrad spokesman, a metal worker, roused the audience to a high pitch when he shouted:

"When the Fascist enemy attacks us we will not fight them alone. Workers in Hamburg, Berlin and Tokyo, oppressed and hungry people of Germany and Japan, people of all colors and races in Germany, Japan, Italy and Africa, all will be with us in our struggle, and we will plant the banner of communism over the entire world."

200,000 Words Credited To U.S.

Vizetelly, Finds At NY Times Book Fair, Many Terms Added

More than 200,000 new terms and meanings have come into existence in the American vernacular in recent years, Dr. Frank A. Vizetelly estimated recently before an audience at The New York Times National Book Fair in the International Building, Rockefeller Center.

Dr. Vizetelly, one of a group of speakers on "History-in-the-Making," said the recent introductions included such scientific terms as electrons, etherons, protons, neutrons, photons and positions, terms such as "brain trust bolony" and "bullsage chiselers" and words like "Conk," "Cellophane," "glassine," "cucaracha" and "grumichama."

Professor C. C. Furnas said that the Ponce de Leon search for the Fountain of Youth now was being centered in the experimental laboratory, and declared that while "the benefits to the average human being are not very large, the benefits are coming and they probably are not far off."

Henry Hazlitt defended the usefulness of what he called "ex parte correspondence," censored news dispatches from Rome and Moscow. Frank Kluckhohn, a correspondent of The New York Times, just returned from Spain, declared the fighting there had set the country back sixty years.

Some Havoc in Words

Dr. Vizetelly, a lexicographer, declared that "ignorance masquerading as superior knowledge has wrought some havoc with many of our common words."

"Our first grammarians, having a profound knowledge of Latin, restored the original Latin forms whereever it seems to them that we had departed from the purity of the older tongue," he said. "Hence today we still insert a wholly intrusive 'b' in debt and doubt, though we make no attempt to pronounce it, and for the good old English 'parfit' we have the undesirable alien 'perfect'."

"But some word changes are due to neither confusion nor ignorance. When the two words 'educational' and 'telegram' were first introduced into English use there was 'hell to pay' in Great Britain, Archbishop Trench and Bulwer Lytton raised that particular quality of hell sanctioned by the Church of England under Queen Victoria.

"Well, we didn't need any constitutional amendment to bring the words 'vocational' and 'radiogram' into being in the United States. They just slipped into The New York Times with 'All the news that's fit to print' and they came to stay."

Professor Furnas discussed the social changes brought about by radio and pointed out that similar processes could be expected to take place with the introduction of television, extension of the use of farm products by industry and the introduction of greater mechanization, as in the mechanical cotton picker, on the farm.

"One thing that sets the present age absolutely apart from all others is the decreased death rate of children, brought about by improved medical practice," he said. "People who used to die under 5 now live to be over 50. These facts are changing the entire age pattern of the Western World, thus changing its tastes, habits and social patterns.

Little Done to Save Aged

"Despite the great progress in saving the babies, very little has been done to help the old men. The old Roman had a better chance of surviving for another ten years than has the old American. No one has solved the problem of senility. At the present time an enormous amount of work is being done in Rockefeller Institute, the Mayo Clinic and dozens of other first-class laboratories upon the subtle influence of the body's internal secretions upon its own well being.

"The inevitable result of this work will be the eventual elongation of the active portion of human lie."

Mr. Hazlitt, holding that the "false emphasis" that the historian gives to facts is inevitable, said "half-truths are better than none at all."

"This applies to the newspaper as well as to the history books," he said. "We need merely consider the correspondence that we get today from Rome and Moscow. Responsible correspondence of this type presents the facts, it is true, but it tends to present them only from one side.

"Yet discerning readers, though they know this, would feel a real deprivation if the ex parte correspondence were to stop altogether. They know that even falsehood is better than no information whatever, because after a while they learn the art of reading between the lines."

Mr. Kluckhohn said that the most to be hoped for out of the present situation in Spain, for the good of the country and the world, was the end of the war. The fighting has wreaked terrible destruction, he said, in damage to cities and towns, the burning of fields, the killing of Spain's population and the apparent depletion of the country's gold reserve.

"Whichever side wins, loses," he added.

Truce Reported On Hollywood'—Radio Tiff

in Hollywood,' he added. "Hollywood isn't crowded nearly as much as its requirements need. We've got to have the little theater movement to bring people out where they can be seen. If they show talent, they won't have trouble landing. You can't kill the goose that laid the golden egg. The stock company was the goose and it laid a lot of golden eggs."

Radio started its invasion of Hollywood more than a year ago, and within recent months much broadcasting activity has been centralized on the west coast, ranking Hollywood above Chicago as a broadcast center. The importance of radio to pictures was seen in the fight last year between the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers and Warner Brothers, when Warner tunes were kept off the air for many weeks. The film company reportedly missed the song "plugs" on the air, generally deemed an essential part of a musical picture's exploitation.

Year Of Self-Rule Tests Philippines

President Manuel Quezon Has Assumed Role Of A Virtual Dictator In The Islands

By ROBERT AURA SMITH

MANILA.—On Nov. 15 the Philippine Commonwealth will celebrate its first anniversary. The year has marked the transition from the previously existing government under an American Governor General to a more autonomous Philippine State under an elected President. Under the provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act, which set up the Commonwealth, the Philippines still have nine years to go before they achieve complete independence.

The first year of the Commonwealth draws to a close with President Manuel L. Quezon admitting the gravest and most widespread discontent within his memory. At the same time President Quezon is developing means of meeting that situation more effective than might have been anticipated.

"A tremendous change has come over the Philippines, along with the rest of the world, within the last decade," Mr. Quezon declared recently. "I used to hear about unrest and discontent at many points, but it was always dissatisfaction with some particular official or some political party.

"Today's discontent is directed not against a party or against this Commonwealth but against the whole social order. It is a blind and often ignorant protest against a situation in which the average man simply hasn't been given a square deal.

New Regime Is Seen

"There is only one way, as I see it, to cope with that situation. We must inaugurate a new regime of social justice. We simply have to beat the radicals at their own game, by attacking the situations of which they complain and remedying them before they can fan discontent into flame."

To meet these problems President Quezon has developed a highly centralized and powerfully unified government in which his will is supreme. That type of government may be vastly different from what the American Congress anticipated when it stipulated in the Tydings-McDuffie Law that the Commonwealth should have "a democratic government, republican in form," but it is not necessarily a bad government for the Philippines at the present. The "dictatorship" of Quezon is one of persuasion and influence to which his country enthusiastically accedes. His dual position as President of the Commonwealth and president of the political party which has an overwhelming majority has assured his control of both executive and legislative branches, while his power of appointment has naturally put the judiciary in a position of unqualified support.

Control of Legislature

This outright control of the legislative branch has resulted in speeding up legislation through the virtual exercise of executive fiat. In the first special session, called immediately after the inauguration of the Commonwealth, nineteen measures were approved. They were all submitted by the administration, and included the important National Defense Act. There was hardly a dissenting vote.

In the regular session 153 bills were passed. Of these, 106 were declared by Presidential proclamation to be "emergency measures" and were approved without the constitutional formality of printing three days prior to third reading. At the close of the regular session, some of the administration bills were still unacted upon. A special session was immediately called, some fifty bills were certified by the President as "urgent," and all were promptly adopted, it was reported to the N.Y. Times.

Heavy Taxes Levied

Many new taxes have been levied, and they are designed to give the government at least another 10,000,000 pesos next year. The mines of the Philippines, in accordance with the Constitution, have been brought a step nearer to nationalization, with a law establishing the government's rights in all claims to which no prior right can be proved. A plebiscite on woman's suffrage has been authorized. The largest budget in recent years has been passed and almost 10,000,000 pesos appropriated for public works.

A frank analysis of Philippine problems, both by President Quezon and other Philippine leaders, has brought out the realization that the economic future of the Philippines is largely dependent upon the possibility of gaining some type of preferential treatment in the American market. Philippine attention is now focused upon the forthcoming trade conferences with the United States and it is felt that their outcome will determine, to a large extent, what is going to happen to the Philippines.

Dependence upon the free American market has in no way changed. Over three-fourths of the foreign trade of the island is with the United States. If the negotiations with the United States fail, it is admitted that independence may as well come soon as late. Obviously, the collapse of the economic structure would make it impossible to carry out Mr. Quezon's program of "social justice."

Perhaps the most significant development in the first year of the Philippine Commonwealth was the adoption of the national defense plan and the creation of a Philippine Army. Under authority of an act of Congress, Major Gen. Douglas MacArthur, former chief of staff of the United States Army, and other officers were sent to the Philippines to assist in putting such a plan in operation.

Fears Set At Rest

The national defense plan calls for the creation of a standing army of 19,000 men. The statement by General MacArthur that this program would make the islands impregnable has been accepted by many Filipinos at its face value; they no longer fear that the moment the United States steps out Japan will step in. Americans in the Philippines, however, are far from reassured by the MacArthur statement, and are not inclined to give confidence to the temporary financial position of the government. The nebulous position of America sovereignty has caused apprehension for which no amount of inter-racial good-will is an adequate remedy.

The widespread unrest, while alarming, is in no sense anti-American. It is social rather than political, and basically economic. The solution of the problem rests in part upon the ability of Manuel Quezon to continue with his benevolent dictatorship, but even more largely upon whether the United States will be willing to sustain the economic structures which it has created in the Philippines.

Canada Prepares To Meet Air Demands

vices have cooperated in splendid fashion to make this transcontinental airway sure and safe. A great part of unemployed relief work in the last few years has gone into the building of airports, and there now are 114 landing places for airplanes between Halifax and Vancouver, providing landing fields every 30 miles across the continent.

Logical Route

Provision has likewise been made for illumination on sections of the transcontinental route where night flying will ordinarily be engaged in. Radio directional beacon stations have been established and arrangements made for a meteorological service, trained weather observers being located at airports and other strategical points along the transcontinental route and the airways system equipped with teletype communication for the dissemination of reports. All this is in readiness to be put into operation at short notice and so to bridge the travel distance between Halifax and Vancouver in 20 hours.

The two phases of aviation in which Canada has lagged behind other countries are in the carrying of passengers on well-established east and west routes and in handling mail on a national scale. Air mail, it is felt, is the key to success in the transcontinental field, and passenger traffic will follow naturally. Survey of an air line for this purpose from Halifax to Vancouver was completed in 1928, and a prairie air mail between Winnipeg and Edmonton and Calgary started two years later as the first section of the transcontinental airline.

The Dominion is divided into five zones, averaging slightly less than 800 miles each, and the type of airplane approved for use over these is capable of travelling at 200 miles an hour. Roughly, the service parallels that of the northern United States transcontinental airway route. It starts at Halifax and goes on to Saint John, then across the State of Maine and following the St. Lawrence River down to Montreal. From the Canadian metropolis the mail will be flown to Ottawa, to Elmsdale, north of Toronto, to which a feeder line will run; then to Winnipeg, through Brandon, Regina, and Calgary to Lethbridge, with a feeder line to Edmonton; and through the lowest passes of the Rocky Mountains to Vancouver, paralleling the international border.

But this has only been part of Canada's dream. She has long anticipated a much greater future for herself as a vast and important link in the chain of imperial airways between Great Britain and the East. Her planes would carry mail and passengers originating in Europe on the flight from the Atlantic to the Pacific, for transfer there. Preparations directed to this end have long been under way. England now is connected by regular air services with India, Australia and South Africa. In the promotion of Empire airways, the development of a service with Canada is a necessary and logical eventuality, not only to link the Dominion with the Motherland but to complete the all-red circle about the globe.

A beginning was made during the summer months, when planes from Montreal met transatlantic liners far down the St. Lawrence Gulf to take off the mails, or overtook them when they were a day down the river to put Europe-bound mails aboard. This has been carried out with the greatest efficiency and to the greatest satisfaction of all concerned. With the operation of the trans-Canada air service, not only mails, but express, merchandise, and even passengers will be transferred similarly, and carried west to the Pacific. But realization of this plan is delayed because the inauguration of flying across Canada will largely coincide with the introduction of the trans-Atlantic service.

Canada's Portion

Canada will participate in the great scheme to span the North Atlantic with airplanes carrying passengers and mail. Canada is joining the United Kingdom, Newfoundland and the Irish Free State in the formation of a joint company to conduct experimental flights and operate a subsequent commercial service. Survey flights were to have been started this year, but have been postponed until next. These early flights will be financed by the British Government, and when the joint company assumes control of the route it will receive an annual subsidy from the participating governments, with Canada itself contributing 20 per cent of the total. A giant airport for this service now is under construction in Newfoundland. Some point in the Maritime Provinces, or possibly near Montreal, will be selected for the Canadian terminal.

The mail for Canada, and later the passengers, destined for Australia and New Zealand, also will be carried over the Atlantic, to be flown across Canada to Vancouver. There it will divert south to cross the Pacific on the new service instituted by United States aviation interests. This is to be merely a temporary arrangement, however.

The developments of a base for a trans-Pacific air service in western Canada is a more remote possibility, but it is regarded as certain to come. The route across the Pacific will be from western Canada over Alaska and down the coast of Russia to Japan, China, Australia and India. This is the shortest distance from Europe and the United States, as a glance at the globe will show.

Altogether, knowing the facts and utilizing a little imagination, it is not difficult to vision Canada as a foremost country in international aviation, and 1937 is expected to be the year which will see the beginning of this great destiny. Canada is favored by nature in that logical world air routes lie across her domain.

The country first linked herself with the machine of the air when her sons were attracted to the aerial services during the great war in such numbers that they came to constitute nearly 50 per cent of the pilots of the Royal Air Force. In the postwar period, adapting the plane to peacetime use, she set it to doing vital work beyond the fringes of civilization. There, airmen working obscurely have achieved such distinctions as inclusion in the King's birthday honors list and selection for important polar expeditions. But all the while the Dominion looked forward to a time when she would move on a plane of equality with other countries in those phases of aviation regarded as of importance internationally.

226 Persons Killed When Italian Ship Explodes

Domei

MASSAWA, Eritrea, Dec. 26—Two hundred and twenty-six persons aboard the Italian liner Cesare Battisti, the majority of them Italian troops returning from East Africa, were killed and many others seriously injured last Monday night when a terrific boiler explosion tore open the decks of the ship, it is announced here today following the lifting of censorship. The blast occurred at 10 p.m. while the ship was anchored at port.

Identification of the victims has been hampered because documents and other means of identification were destroyed by the explosion. Those injured were taken to the "Umberto First" hospital here while others were taken to Asmara.

Passengers who were not injured were transferred to the S.S. Tripolitana today, it is announced.

League Of Nations Faced With Grave Problem

dictators cannot accept "diktats" they must improvise the common agency the League already provides for the other. The paradoxical conclusion is that the worse the war danger becomes, the greater the chances of Geneva to play a leading role, and the only thing that seems sure to kill the League is the finding of a better alternative to it—one so much better that it can prevent world war.

The most loyal supportens of the League here would undoubtedly prefer to see the League superseded by a better alternative than to see it return to the front page as a supreme war council in action. What makes Geneva gloomy, then, is not fear for the League so much as fear for Europe and fear for the world, fear that the League cannot prevent the looming catastrophe, fear that a better alternative to the League cannot be found in time to prevent catastrophe, fear that effective peace machinery must be worked out, if at all, in war's dreadful furnace.

System Unsound

To a striking degree the great majority in Geneva seem to retain their belief in the fundamentals of the covenant solution of the world problem.

Only a few here believe that the League system is basically unsound. But even those who believe the League is built on wrong principles strongly agree it should be preserved until it can be replaced with more effective world organization.

Perhaps what best sustains the League now is a lack of something better, for even those who argue that the League has had no real chance yet seem much less sure at heart of its workability than they were a year ago, much more ready to try any promising alternative.

Geneva draws most of its hope now from the recent monetary accord initiated by the three great democracies and President Roosevelt's re-election. The hope is based partly on economic and mainly on political factors. On the economic side the hope is that the accord may develop greater monetary stability, reduce trade barriers and thus induce enough world prosperity to soften and make soluble the European politico-economic tangle, the war debts question and so on.

The hope is, in other words, for a repetition of what happened ten years ago. Then rising prosperity was accompanied and stimulated by the softening and solution (however temporary) of problems that seemed then impossible of solution (even temporarily) — funding the war debts, scaling down reparations, restoring tattered currencies, drawing Locarno out of the Ruhr occupation.

The political factor that most encourages Geneva seems to be the growing tendency she sees in the democracies to work together. Geneva herself is certainly much more "democracy-minded" than she was this time in 1934.

At that time no serious agreement had ever been made among the three great democracies along. Then there came the naval accord among them, begun as an effort to renew a five-power treaty. The monetary accord was the first big lead the three great democracies ever together gave the world, their first attempt to promote world agreement by agreeing first among themselves.

Geneva knows how full its graveyard is with Anglo-American moves to bring the French to reason, Franco-American moves to bring the British round, Anglo-French moves to bring the Americans in line. An Anglo-Franco-American move to bring the world in line on anything is something so new as to stir Geneva's imagination, to arouse hope by merely suggesting the possibility of a fresh approach to old insolubles.

The part the monetary accord and the Hull tariff policy played in obtaining Mr. Roosevelt's great majority encourages here the hope that the President will now develop more boldly this new approach to world affairs. The second term is expected in itself to facilitate a more courageous foreign policy, and the President made clear to Geneva in his message to Congress a year ago how "democracy-minded" he is as regards that world. Geneva feels very deeply that she has a friend in him who will do the best he can.

German Hoarders To Face Execution

provided are often severe. Commissar Wagner may close temporarily or permanently establishments of economic rebels.

Adoption of the death penalty for transfers of property abroad and the theory of prices announced by the Price Commissar seems to be approaching remarkably near some Soviet ideas or at least openly to recognize the principle of State capitalism. The trial of smugglers of capital by the Peoples Tribunal, created solely to deal with treason, in itself involves a new doctrine of wealth's function in the Third Reich. The property owner or business man is being informed that he is merely the custodian of public wealth and that upon his control the State is placing increasing and extraordinary restrictions.

The official comment issued with the price-freezing decree throws a great deal of light on the direction Germany's economic development evidently is intended to take. It calls attention to the fact that the Price Commissar was installed only a month ago—Oct. 29—and says:

"The Reich Commissar for Prices found himself at the beginning of his duties with the necessity of establishing a firm starting point for the construction of a price system. This decree fulfils this necessity in that it makes Oct. 18—the day on which the Fuehrer started the Four-Year Plan—a starting point for all price changes.

"The prohibition of price increases is made necessary by developments since the announcement of the Four-Year Plan. It is entirely independent of mere seasonal changes. Price increases occurred which were entirely unjustified and resulted either from anxiety regarding a supposed goods shortage or purely selfish motives.

"Such tendencies must not only be destroyed in the future but also be crushed retroactively. Whoever has in the meantime paid or asked higher prices should suffer for making such speculation. Every attempt to avoid the decree and go unpunished is made impossible by its detailed provisions.

"The issuance of such a decree does not justify the opinion that in the future all price changes will be outlawed. Contrarily, the future price policy will be elastically adapted to the necessities of economic life. However, only the interests of our whole public economy can be considered. Therefore, it became necessary to divorce the process of prices from the multitude of subjective liberalistic influences and place it under the higher law of general utility.

"To avoid economic paralysis the decree provides exceptions. Such exceptions will be made only when common reasons of public economy are present. The possibility has been created on the basis of stable prices created by decree, to develop a price policy in accord with public advantage."

All Youth Must Be Nazi

The Cabinet promulgated today a decree under which all German boys and girls will be forced to enroll in the Hitler Youth Organization or the National Socialist League of German Girls and actively take part in the two organizations' work.

The decree makes it impossible for any young German to stand aside from the National Socialist youth movement and apparently does away with the still-existing church youth organizations, notably the Catholic Youth Societies guaranteed by the concordat with the Vatican. Obviously no time will be left for anything but their strictly religious activities.

The Hitler Youth enforced membership will increase it only by a fourth. There are about 8,000,000 young people in Germany between ten and eighteen. Of this number 6,000,000 are already, in the four sections of the party's youth movements.

There are 1,500,000 Hitler Youth between fourteen and eighteen, 2,200,000 members of the Young Folk between ten and fourteen. There are 1,000,000 members of the League of German Girls and there are 1,300,000 members of the Jungmaedel from ten to fifteen years old.

Approximately 2,000,000 young Germans who now are living their own lives independent of the stringent National Socialist training required by youth organizations will have to don uniforms and prepare to acquire National Socialist ideology. The exact figures are difficult to obtain because many members of the League of German Girls remain in it until they are twenty-one years old.

Baldur von Schirach, leader of the Hitler Youth, whose attacks on churches aroused protests on many occasions among devout Protestant and Catholic parents, issued a declaration of gratitude to Chancellor Adolf Hitler in which he said:

"The mission of our twenty-one fallen comrades—the 'immortal company'—is fulfilled. Germany's whole youth has become the Hitler Youth. Heil the Fuehrer!"

The decree reads:

"All German youth within the Reich borders are united in the Hitler Youth.

"All German youth, outside parents' homes and schools, are to be trained, bodily, mentally, spiritually and morally, in the spirit of National Socialism for service to the nation and to the unified people.

"Responsibility for training all German youth in the Hitler Youth is given to the Reich Youth Leader of the National Socialist party. He therewith assumes the title Youth Leader of the German Reich. His administration assumes the character of the highest grade of Reich administration, directly responsible to the Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor.

"Ordinances and general administrative regulations necessary for the enforcement of this decree will be issued by the Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor."

Whether the Catholic Bishops and clergy will accept this new order of things remains to be seen. There can be little doubt that Cardinal von Faulhaber's recent visit to Berchtesgaden for long conversations with Hitler was in connection with this.

The Cabinet finished the day's series of new limitations on private economy with a general ruling enabling the Four-Year Plan Commissar to develop natural resources contrary to the owners' desires without having recourse to ordinary court procedure.

A gasoline tax was officially announced which will raise the price 9 per cent. Gasoline is sold here by the liter, and the price now goes up four pfennigs per liter, about 6½ cents per gallon. Gasoline already costs in Germany double or triple the American price.

This is the second increase in the tax on motor fuel. In November, 1935, the customs duty on imports of motor fuel oils was increased.

The income derived from the new tax will be devoted to the construction of an automobile highways system, according to the official statement. The government program calls for the completion of 1,000 kilometers of trunk roads yearly.

The gasoline tax increase is reported to be part of a project for increasing various sources of government income. A new property tax of propaganda rather than practical significance is under discussion, also a new beer tax of much greater practical importance.

Proposals to increase the turnover tax were definitely rejected as likely to depress business activity.

Japanese Hen's Record Is Not Recognized

Domei

WASHINGTON.—Federal poultry experts have refused to concede the world championship egg laying title to Japan.

A news dispatch from Tokyo reported that a Japanese farmer had a leghorn hen which had set a new world record by laying 361 eggs in a year.

"That's a mighty fine claim," said Mr. Berly Winton, poultry expert at the Department of Agriculture, "but the farmer's claims are unofficial. We don't recognize them."

Mr. Winton then produced records which showed that a white leghorn hen in this country had been credited with 360 eggs in one year in an official egg-laying contest at Corvallis, Oregon, in 1934-35.

The official world title is held, at the moment, by a black orpington hen in New Zealand, added Mr. Winton. During 1930 official records show that she laid 364 eggs.

In official egg-laying contests, the hens are placed in a special nests called "trap nests." When a hen enters one of these she can not get out until released by a "disinterested official" who can check her leg band numbers and count the eggs.

Albanian King Engaged To Hungarian Countess

Domei

BUDAPEST, Dec. 28—Considerable sensation was aroused here today following receipt of reliable reports that Aohfed Bey Zogu, King of Albania, had become engaged to Countess Hanna Mikes of the Hungarian nobility.

Rumors of the engagement continued to circulate here despite the fact that Countess Mikes, who arrived here by plane from Rome today, refused to either confirm or deny the reports.

At the airdrome, where she was swamped by newspermen, Countess Mikes flatly stated, "I cannot say anything on the subject. The matter has not reached an official stage anyhow. You won't hear anything from me regarding the affair."

Observers declared that Countess Hanna, who is only 18 years old, is regarded as one of the outstanding beauties of the Hungarian aristocracy and is also known for her elegance and personal charm. She is the daughter of the late Count Arnim Mikes who was one of the richest landowners in Hungary.

King Zogu I, it was recalled celebrated his 41st birthday last October and is more than twice as old as Countess Hanna.

Tariffs Largely Reduced

Italy, which was the last to give up free trade in order to adopt a quota policy, he said, has recently taken important steps toward normalization in this field.

"Lately the fixing of a new value of the lira," he said, "has been accompanied by the abolition of the exceptional duties established in these last few years and by a very considerable reduction, up to even 70 per cent, of the duties on various essential commodities. Italy has also abolished numerous export duties.

"Specific and efficient regulations have been adopted to keep unaltered the internal price levels so as to serve the interests of the Italian consumer, especially the working classes, who, during these last few months, have had a 9 per cent increase of salary, a provision thus reaching 6,500,000 workers in the field of industry, agriculture, commerce and banking."

Ambassador Suvich outlined at length the progress of Italy under Fascism.

"Mussolini," he said, "has promised to 'go toward the people' and he has kept his promise.

"I am convinced that many of those who in America shudder at the very idea of a dictator, would probably modify some of their ideas on this subject if only they could be present in one of those moments when he visits an industrial plant or the countryside. I wish that all could know personally this dictator as I have had the privilege of knowing him, in his simplicity, in his humanity, in his sense of solidarity with the humble and the needy.

"Mussolini has found himself in the happy situation of enjoying the absolute confidence of the King and the people of Italy and he has used this privilege. But he has done it for the welfare of his country."

Airplane Mass Production Has Trial In England

Chain-Assembly System Is Adopted To Speed War Craft

Some indication of how Great Britain's new method of mass production of aircraft are working out is contained in the latest report of the Society of British Aircraft Constructors, which discusses the building of the government's formidable Handley Page Harrow bomber.

Great Britain adopted a vast building program recently to keep pace with the air forces of the other powers, particularly Germany and Russia. The assistance of the entire British aircraft industry was enlisted to aid the government in carrying out its plan for 1,500 first-line fighting planes and many reserves by 1938.

"Preliminary drawings were begun not more than a year ago, yet today the first Harrow is going through trial flights, its early successors are in the final stage of assembly, and in the vast new factory workshops many more machines are quickly and precisely taking shape," it is reported.

Mass Production For Speed

"How these great aircraft, weighing many tons and measuring some 120 feet from wing-tip to wing-tip, may be built so rapidly is a secret which is partly explained as the application of mass production methods to airplane making, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. In general terms the structure of the airplane is broken down into relatively small sections, each of which is taken separately through the processes of manufacture and is then carried forward with the production flow through the shops for assembly."

Detailed results under the system, including the saving in man hours, are not revealed because they are military secrets, the report says. However, it says, the various parts of the new bombers are taking shape and marching in a controlled flow at a rate which the old methods could never have approached.

Bigger Bomb Capacity

The Harrow bomber, according to the report, has a bomb capacity greater than that of any other plane in service with the Royal Air Force. It also can be adapted quickly to transportation of considerable numbers of fully armed troops. In addition, its normal cruising speed is said to be considerably greater than that of any comparable airplane.

Large numbers of the bombers are scheduled for delivery to the government within the next few weeks from the Handley Page airdrome at Radlett. They have been camouflaged by painting them black, brown and dull green. Soon another new Handley Page aircraft—a high-speed "fighter-bomber" monoplane—will go into mass construction.

French Armed Aid Pledged To Allies

Delbos Says Country Is Ready To Help Britain And Belgium Against Any Aggressor

PARIS, Dec. 4.—Without seeking any dramatic effect in the midst of a long speech on French foreign policy, Yvon Delbos, Foreign Minister in the Cabinet of Leon Blum, announced this evening that France would use all her forces on land, at sea and in the air "spontaneously and immediately" for the defense of Great Britain and Belgium against any unprovoked aggression.

It was a return promise by the French Government for that made to France and Belgium by Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden on behalf of the British Government recently and its announcement was cheered by the whole Chamber.

In its way it is by far the best substitute for the old Entente Cordiale that has been devised. It fits into existing engagements and does not add new obligations. By both countries it is frank recognition of the fact that if they do not stand together their respective empires may prove too great a temptation to those who have none.

Mr. Delbos put the grounds for the agreement deeper than that. He claimed that they had to do with the mutual love of liberty and democracy to the hopes for which President Roosevelt's words at Buenos Aires had given encouragement.

"I do not wish to draw any excessive or indiscreet conclusion from these words," Mr. Delbos said. "But I have a right to note that the President did not dissimulate his preferences and to affirm with him that the hope of the world lies with democracy."

Germany's Rights Uncontested

At the same time Mr. Delbos was quick to declare that there was nothing exclusive in this line-up of democratic nations. France asked nothing better than that Germany should quit breaking treaties every few months and upsetting peoples' nerves and seeming to mix in other peoples' business and that she should get down to the simple business of finding ground for an agreement with France and participate with her in a general effort at economic renovation.

"We don't contest any of Germany's rights," he said. "We haven't any hidden thoughts about encirclement or hegemony. We really and sincerely want to find a basis for agreement for our mutual benefit and disarmament."

From Italy also all that France asked was that she would examine the issues which divided them in a practical manner and get rid of the clouds that are covering the Mediterranean.

All this led up to the Spanish issue and the French policy of non-intervention. Mr. Delbos stood by that policy firmly and uncompromisingly in the face of the Communist opposition. He, himself, was sympathetic, he said, toward what was the legitimate government of Spain when the insurrection began, but "when one has the responsibility of peace or war one has not the right to yield to sentimental impulses which might entrain a terrible war."

He intended to keep France and, if possible, everybody else out of a civil dispute which seemed to be having a peculiar fascination for a great many other peoples, it was reported to the N.Y. Times. Above all, an effort must be made and continued to prevent Europe from being divied by the two ideologies into seperate camps. Those measures which had been taken to secure non-intervention must be increased and France would continue to do all she could to prevent this war from affecting other peoples.

At present the government would not, however, recognize, as some others had done, the leaders of the insurrection in Spain as legitimate. No event in Spain had yet justified such a step, and the republican government was still the only legitimate government. Neither would France recognize the rights of belligerents or admit that Spanish ships would act as belligerents against French ships under the pretext of a blockade.

The interests of French commerce would be protected, as would also all other French rights in Morocco and the Mediterranean.

To all neighbors Mr. Delbos gave this warning, that while France was wise enough to want to keep out of trouble she also was strong enough to defend her interests and rights.

The debate will be concluded tomorrow, when Mr Blum will speak. Tonight the Communists are still threatening to vote against the government, but general opinion is that they will not finally try to provoke a crisis, especially as Mr. Delbos today had some nice things to say about Soviet Russia being a loyal and active member of the League of Nations.

Debts were not mentioned in today's debate.

Konoye Well Received By German Audience

Domei

BERLIN, Dec. 29—Leading a large ensemble of 80 artists, Viscount Hidemaro Konoye, well-known Japanese conductor, was given an enthusiastic welcome tonight during his fourth concert here. Playing to a packed audience in the Philharmonic Hall, the Japanese conductor gave a well-balanced program which included musical scores such as Schumann's Third Symphony, Brahm's First Symphony and Pfitzner's Ballad Herr Oluf.

He will give a series of overseas broadcasts beginning January 1 and will leave for New York on January 6 aboard the German liner Bremen, it is announced.

Mr. E. J. Kitson, of Kobe, celebrated his 70th birthday on New Year's Day. A presentation was made to him by his friends of the Kobe Club.

VIOLINIST TO ARRIVE

Mr. Mischa Elman, the world-famous violinist, and Mr. Vladirmir Padwa, pianist, will arrive in Yokohama by the Chichibu Maru which is due on January 8. Mr. Elman will give recitals at the Hibiya Public Hall on January 21, 22, 25, 26 and 27.

AT LAKE NOJIRI

Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Corrison with their children and Mr. Geoffrey Oram are spending the New Year holidays at Lake Nojiri.

MAHJONG PARTY AT AMERICAN CLUB

The entertainment committee of the American Club is arranging a bridge and Mahjong party for Sunday evening starting at 5 p.m. Those wishing to play together will please send in their names. Later in the evening a buffet supper will be served.

AT HOME MONDAY

The Foreign Minister and Mrs. Hachiro Arita were at home Monday from 12 to 2 p.m. to all officials of the Foreign Office.

AT KAWANA HOTEL

Among the members of the diplomatic corps spending the week-end at the Kawana Hotel, Ito are the American Ambassador, the French Ambassador and Mrs. Kammerer, the Swiss Minister and Mrs. Thurnheer, the American Secretary and Mrs. E. R. Dickover and the American Secretary and Mrs. George Andrews.

AT LAKE KAWAGUCHI

Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Moss and their daughter Miss Audrey Moss left Friday for Lake Kawaguchi to spend the New Year holidays.

FANCY DRESS PARTY

A Fancy Dress party was held at the Kanaya Hotel Nikko on Friday. Prizes were awarded to Mr. and Mrs. R. Divers of Sendai (most original costumes), Miss Lovely and Mr. J. W. Smellie (most beautiful costumes), Mr. and Mrs. C. Skinner (the best couple) and to Mrs. J. W. Smellie for the most comical costume.

WOMEN'S CLUB LIBRARY

The library of the Tokyo Women's Club will be closed till January 11 on account of the holidays.

INJURED WHILE SKIING

Mrs. Stuart Lillico was injured when she crashed into a tree while skiing in Karatsu. She and Mr. Lillico are staying in Karatsu till the extent of Mrs. Lillico's injured is ascertained.

RETURNED SUNDAY

Mrs. M. A. Vile, her daughter Miss Mary Vile and the Misses Betty and Dalice Cameron returned to Yokohama from Nikko where they spent the New Year holidays on Sunday.

AT HOTEL NEW GRAND

Guests at the Hotel New Grand over the New Year holidays included Mr. T. Holt, Mr. R. Nagai, Mrs. T. Faberial, Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Gillespie and family, Mrs. G. M. O. Matthews and daughter, Mr. J. O. Winter, Mrs. C. Walmsley, Mrs. E. M. Stuart, Mr. T. Wasela, Mr. K. F. Mayer, Mr. J. A. Town, Mr. K. Kakiage, Mr. H. Abegg, Mr. Y. Hamada, Mr. Y. Yoshimasu and family, Mr. Y. Owanaga and family, Mr. and Mrs. H. Kattan and son, Mrs. J. Minshall, Mr. E. Amran, Mrs. A. Faveyrial, Mr. H. Lang and son, Mr. Cho, Mr. W. H. Robinson, Mr. L. B. Levin, Mr. and Mrs. Boyce Mr. and Mrs. W. Russel, Mr. G. Murata, Major Rutland, Mr. R. Sasaki, Mr. F. Garnett, Mr. N. Sekiguchi, Mr. H. Bosch, Mr. J. Matsuda, Mr. and Mrs. Wendt, Mrs. Fichter and daughter, Mr. C. J. Lloyd, Mr. K. Seaholm, Mr. Du Duus, Mr. C. A. Owen, Mr. Matsuda, Mr. Umizuka, Mr. C. S. Brisk and Mr. and Mrs. Wakao.

RETURN TO SHANGHAI

Mr. and Mrs. Hollis Wilbur of the Y.M.C.A. in Shanghai and their son Mr. Halsey Wilbur who is connected with the National City Bank of New York in Kobe, expect to leave for Shanghai today. They have been staying in Tokyo as the house guests of Mr. and Mrs. Russell L. Durgin.

NEW YEAR IN MIYANOSHITA

Mr. and Mrs. J. Day Mason and Mr. and Mrs. D. D. McGregor left Tokyo Friday to spend the New Year in Miyanoshita.

AT KANAYA HOTEL

New guests at the Kanaya Hotel, Nikko, on Saturday, included.

Mrs. Akuzawa and son, Mrs. Tajima and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. A. Kawfield and family, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Kaga, Mr. and Mrs. E. Baerwald, Mrs. H. Steinfield, Miss H. Sachs, Miss N. Brunell, Mr. and Mrs. R. Ruegg, Mr. R. M. O'Hara, Mr. and Mrs. M. S. Wiersum, Mr. and Mrs. C. Skinner, Miss C. E. Laver, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Fox and child, Mr. and Mrs. P. Nipkow, Miss M. Kramor, Mr. R. Mosol, Mr. Andreas, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Ayers, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Aurell, Miss G. Aurell, Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Lovely and family, Mrs. and Miss M. Vile, the Misses B. and D. Cameron, Mr. E. Lovedar, Mr. and Mrs. G. Loesch, Mr. A. Noack, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Timm, Mr. H. Laver, Mr. E. A. Koemmer, Mr. and Mrs. Kuhara, Miss C. Catto, Miss N. K. Pocock, Mr. and Mrs. H. Wistrand and children.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Coville and children, Miss D. M. Fuller, Miss M. J. Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. E. Pipper, Mr. and Mrs. E. Faure, Miss L. Pieper, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Piper, Miss J. Thoits, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Smellie, Mr. and Mrs. R. Divers, Mr. Splittgerber, Mr. J. Van Heogerhuys, Mr. P. Lange, Miss Broms, Mr. and Mrs. O. Luethge, Wing-Commander and Mrs. R. W. Chappell and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. W. Haensgen, Captain and Mrs. Rawlings and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Hill and child, Mr. T. Adachi, Mr. T. Sasaki, The Finnish Minister and Mrs. Valvanne and child, Captain and Mrs. H. M. Bemis, Lieutenant-Colonel and Mrs. W. C. Crane and children, Mr. Y. Miwa and family, the Soviet Ambassador and Mrs. Contantin Yurenev, Mr. and Mrs. Hansen, Mr. and Miss Deichiman, Mr. and Mrs. V. J. Barbashoff, Mr. A. Pickford, Mr. K. J. Brown, Mr. Y. Sasaki and family, Mr. T. Aida, Mr. and Mrs. A. Elked, Miss Elked, Mr. and Mrs. Y. Sasaki, Miss G. Kerly, Miss E. Lellar, Mr. A. Y. Napoleon-Marie Louise Letters Sold At Auction governess to Marie Louise. The earliest letters in this correspondence are dated 1799 and the latest 1846, a year before the death of the empress. They are full of personal details, and, during the last years of her son's life, contain constant references to his ailing health. He died in 1832.

Nor are Napoleon's enemies absent from the collection. There is a fine letter from Nelson, referring to Kleber's victory over the Turks at Heliopolis in 1800. There are also others from Admiral Sir Sidney Smith (whom Napoleon, with unconscious irony, calls "an ambitious young man, who wants to make his fortune and constantly seeks to make himself prominent,") and from Sir William Hamilton, the British Ambassador at Naples, and his wife, the notorious Lady Hamilton, whom Nelson loved and Romney painted.

Finally, out of this huge mass of Napoleonic material, one may mention a few relics of a non-literary kind, notably four Sevres plates. They were among the sixty which Napoleon's faithful valet, Marchant, took with him when he accompanied the Emperor in his flight after Waterloo. They were decorated with scenes from Napoleon's campaigns, and were in use at Longwood during the last years of exile on St. Helena.

Sikorsky Predicts Planes Of 100 Tons

Says They Will Be Common In Next Five Years And Will Cross Every Ocean

Predictions as to the immediate future of aviation were made by eight leaders in various fields of aeronautics at a round-table discussion at the Engineering Societies Auditorium at New York City recently on "The Next Five Years in Aviation."

The meeting, which was a prelude to the dinner recently in honor of Dr. George W. Lewis, director of research of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, given by the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences, was sponsored jointly by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, the Society of Automotive Engineers and the Institute. At its close motion pictures of the immense new aeronautical research laboratories of Great Britain, France, Germany and Italy were shown for the first time in the United States, according to the New York Times.

The experts said the advances already made and assured in spark-ignition aircraft engines and in the fuel of high anti-knock rating to burn in them would soon outstrip the diesel engine in economy of fuel consumption and make its wide use in aircraft unlikely; that land planes and flying boats of 100,000 to 200,000 pounds weight would be a commonplace; that contacts between airplanes and airships in flight for the transfer of passengers and mails would be regular practice; that all major oceans would be regularly flown, and that such steadiness of an airplane in flight would be achieved that a glass of water would not be spilled in rough air.

The round table was under the chairmanship of Professor Jerome C. Hunsaker, head of the Departments of Mechanical and Aeronautical Engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Lighter Motors Predicted

C. F. Taylor, Professor of Aeronautical Engineering at M. I. T., predicted engines of much less than one pound weight per horsepower in the next five years, with fuel consumption reduced to .35 pounds per brake horsepower per hour, as compared with .50 or .45 pounds at present. Liquid-cooled engines would also be much improved, he said, and would perhaps be necessary for high-altitude flying.

Dr. Graham Edgar, director of research of the Ethyl Gasoline Corporation, prophesied that the further improvement of fuels to increase anti-knock ratings would lead to increases of power of 30, 40 and even 50 per cent in given engines. Within the five-year period, he added, the so-called 100-octane fuel, now confined to military and racing uses, would be in as common use as the 87-octane fuel of today.

"There will be still lower consumption for long-distance flying," he went on, "and the Diesel engine will not make substantial progress in aviation for this reason, except in the field of 2,000-horsepower engines or larger, unless Diesel fuel is much improved."

The new fuels, he pointed out were made from blends of gasoline, anti-knock compounds and the products of waste gases of refineries.

Although his topic was Diesel engines, the next speaker, Roland Chilton of the Wright Aeronautical Corporation, surprised the audience by agreeing fully with the two men who had preceded him. He said that at the present rate of development of spark ignition engines and their fuel, they would outstrip Diesel economy within a year.

Igor I. Sikorsky, vice president of the Sikorsky Aircraft Corporation, startled his hearers by saying that enough was known of airplane design and construction now to make possible the building of aircraft weighing 1,000,000 pounds and capable of carrying 1,000 passengers.

"This would not be economic, however," he said. "Frequency of operation is one of the benefits of air transport. So I do not look for such sizes. I do, however, confidently predict land planes and flying boats in operation, or at least under construction, in the next five years of 100,000 to 200,000 pounds.

Efficiency and Size

"The efficiency of aircraft improves with size, we have found. Speed will be somewhat increased also to a point where perhaps 250 miles an hour cruising will be standard for land planes. Speed greater than this does not seem to me necessary except for military and special purposes. At this point I believe we should concentrate effort on greater comfort, more cubic space, greater safety and greater steadiness in the air.

"With heavy wing loading—up to forty pounds to the square foot or even more for special purposes—we can have airplanes so steady that even the water in a glass would not be spilled in rough air. It is now easily possible to design and build planes of 4,500 miles range with a payload of 10 per cent of the gross weight: factors satisfactory for the geography of this world."

B. C. Boulton, engineer of the Glenn L. Martin Company, agreed with the views of Mr. Sikorsky as to size. He pointed out that structural difficulties do not increase unduly with large aircraft.

Professor Alexander Klemin, director of the Daniel Guggenheim Institute at New York University, also endorsed Mr. Sikorsky's views in the main. He pointed out, however, that with huge size, problems of longitudinal stability in aircraft would have to be met and that designers might change the form of craft as they grew larger to bring the loads closer to the center of gravity. He also suggested, as did William Littlewood, chief engineer of American Airlines, that further improvements in the automatic gyro-pilot might bring about its use as a direct stabilizing medium.

Commander Charles E. Rosendahl, commandant of the Naval Air Station at Lakehurst, N. J., predicted that airplanes would hook onto and take off from airships as regular practice, thus further expediting service for both passengers and mails.

The films of foreign research laboratories, which showed their huge recent expansion, were explained respectively by Group Captain T. E. B. Howe of the British Embassy; Colonel N. Champsour of the French Embassy; Dr. F. Seewald, in charge of the German laboratories at Adlershof, and Lieut. Col. Vincenzo Cappola, Air Attache of the Italian Embassy, whose paper was read by Leaster D. Gardner, secretary of the institute.

Artificial Rain Now Falls Freely

From now on artificial rain can fall at fall speed in Warner Bros.-First National films.

That may not seem important to you, but it's a problem that has been worrying those meticulous movie technical men, the weather makers for a long time.

It seems that hitherto artificial rain used on indoor "exteriors" couldn't fall from a sufficient height to let the drops speed up to a realistic m.p.h. rate before falling into camera range. Even on the average huge sound stage there wasn't overhead room sufficient to secure this height between ground and waterpipes over the sets.

The Warner rainmakers solved the problem by making Stage Seven weather headquarters from now on. That is the stage which was raised bodily some forty feet recently to provide loft room for an exceedingly tall musical number set in "Cain and Mabel." It is also an air-conditioned stage, something important to the weather men.

Just now, for example, they're pouring rain from an adequate height on a grave yard used in the Billy Mauch starring film, "Penrod and Sam." Not only are the raindrops falling from this increased height at a sufficient speed to suit the technical men's most finicky notions of realism but this particular shower is warmed. The twelve-year-old star and other children on the set have lengthy scenes under the downpour hence the tempered raindrops. If you crave further technical data, it is said it was necessary to start the raindrops at a temperature of about 100 degrees F. as they leave the pipes above, to have them 75 degrees when they land. The general temperature inside the stage is, of course, accurately controlled.

Permanent and semi-permanent piping and other equipment has been installed in the versatile stage, so that rain, hail, snow, sleet and fog can be supplied on order, in any form or quality. At the same time the use of the tall structure for musical numbers which require extraordinary height, or as the curtain loft of a theater stage set, remains unimpaired.

The rain storm served up for Director William McGann in the "Penrod and Sam" graveyard sequence initiated the new method in weather-making. As soon as this picture has been finished sets for several others requiring varying weather will be erected in succession. Those requiring outdoor rain storms will be given preference.

Use Of Liquor Gains 31 PC. In Year, Says U.S.

Consumption Of Industrial Alcohol Increases 41.6%, The Treasury Reports

An increase of more than 31 per cent in the consumption of domestic and imported distilled spirits and rectified spirits and wines, and of 41.6 per cent in the products of industrial alcohol plants, was reported by the United States Treasury Department recently in making public statistics covering the last fiscal year, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

Figured in terms of taxable gallons released for consumption as tax-paid, the figures showed that the products of domestic distilleries which went over the bars and dining and card tables and kitchen sinks of the nation in the fiscal year which ended June 30 amounted to 76,330,524, as compared with 58,083,021 in the preceding twelve months, an increase of 31.4 per cent. Imported spirits released for consumption in the same period amounted to 9,803,255 taxable gallons, an increase of 31.2 per cent over the 7,470,339 gallons released for consumption as tax-paid in the fiscal year 1935. Releases of industrial alcohol rose 41.6 per cent, from 16,990,972 gallons in 1935 to 24,052,532 in 1936.

Consumption Rise Continues

During the first four months of the current fiscal year, the Treasury reported, the increase in consumption of tax-paid liquor "has continued at a slightly decelerated rate." A combination of the statistics from domestic distilleries with those from industrial alcohol plants and imports indicated that in the period from July 1 to October 31, inclusive, 43,179,656 taxable gallons of spirits have been released for consumption, an increase of 27.8 per cent over the amount in the corresponding period in the last fiscal year. That situation was summarized in the following table:—

	1935	1936	Pct.
	—(July-Oct.)—		inc.
Produced at distilleries	23,618,434	27,772,500	17.4
Produced at industrial alcohol plants	7,825,798	10,620,054	35.7
Total domestic .	31,444,233	38,342,554	21.9
Imports for consumption	2,353,756	4,837,102	105.5
Total domestic and imported.	33,797,989	43,179,656	27.8

United States Production Soars

Registered distilleries, during the fiscal year 1936, produced 223,659,539 gallons of whisky, 2,106,648 gallons of rum, 6,229,241 gallons of gin, 20,094,419 gallons of brandy, and 1,778,078 gallons of other spirits or a total of 253,867,925 gallons. Total production in 1935 amounts to 169,126,472 gallons and in 1934, 76,506,388 gallons. The production of each type of distilled spirits except rum increased over the previous year. Whisky production was equal to 88.1 per cent of the total in 1936, compared with 88.2 per cent in 1935 and 81.5 per cent in 1934.

During the past year the capacity of the industry was increased still further by the addition of new plants and extension of established plants. The surveyed twenty-four-hour maximum producing capacity of authorized whisky, rum and gin distilleries stood at 1,301,347 proof gallons on June 30, 1936, compared with 1,094,114 on June 30, 1935. During 1936 there were withdrawn on the payment of tax, 67,299,166 gallon of whisky, 453,273 gallons of rum, 6,408,843 gallons of gin, 1,649,262 gallons of brandy and 519,980 gallon of other spirits. Of the tax-paid withdrawals of whisky during the past year, only about 27 per cent represented current year production, compared with approximately 55 per cent in 1935 and approximately 75 per cent in 1934. The percentage of the year's withdrawals that had been bottled in bond, however, was only 1.9, compared with 2.1 in 1935.

Bond Stocks Small

Although the supply of whisky more than one year old is steadily increasing, stocks eligible for bottling in bond will continue to be relatively small until the fiscal year 1938, when 1934 production becomes available. Of the whisky produced during the past year, 204,342,466 gallons, or 91 per cent, remained in storage on June 30. This ratio compared with 81 per cent in 1935 and 76 per cent in 1934. As the result of the large production for storage, total stocks of whisky nearly doubled during the year, and on June 30, 1936, they amounted to 300,658,508 gallons, a figure more than 22,000,000 gallons in excess of peak pre-prohibition stocks reached June 30, 1914.

2d Hindenburg May Enter N.Y.

Lehmann Says Sister Ship Will Have Same Speed, To Be Raised Gradually

By RALPH W. BARNES

BERLIN, Nov. 25.—In a position to speak of the future in the light of a full season of personal experience with the North Atlantic dirigible service, Captain Ernst A. Lehmann, managing director of the German Zeppelin Transport Company, expressed his conviction here that the airplane would not drive the rigid airship from the North Atlantic.

Moreover, this veteran pilot, whose experience with lighter-than-air craft goes back to pre-war flights and to the Zeppelin raids over London during the war, disclosed that the LZ-130, sister ship of the Hindenburg, under construction at Friedrichshafen, might be completed in time to make her first appearance over New York before the end of 1937, perhaps late in October.

Million Miles for Graf

At the time of the interview with Captain Lehmann the Hindenburg was preparing to enter her hangar at Frankfort-am-Main for the winter, following the completion since last April of ten round-trip crossings to the United States and seven to South America. Likewise, the veteran Graf Zeppelin, which is now employed solely in the South American service and has covered in all well over 1,000,000 miles, was about to go under cover until spring.

In the seven months since the Hindenburg was first sighted above Manhattan, the plans of various interests for airplane services across the North Atlantic have progressed. German airplanes have forged the way in several flights over the route via the Azores.

These preparations have given new significance to the question whether dirigibles will be able to weather the stiff competition between Europe and America which heavier-than-air craft promise to provide. Captain Lehmann, in the Zeppelin Company's Berlin office, said he thought they could meet the competition.

He Is Confident

"In view of the experience of the last season," he said, "I am convinced more than before that the airplane will not run us out of the North Atlantic area. I can give three reasons for my view

"First, we have one thing above all else to sell, and that is comfort. And the relative comfort which we have provided in the Hindenburg will be improved in later ships.

"Second, we can expect a reasonable increase in speed. Next year the Hindenburg will travel the North Atlantic faster than this year; later ships—those to follow after the LZ-130—will be faster than the Hindenburg.

"Third, we can sell safety. The airplane has not yet given proof that it is safe over the North Atlantic. The dirigible has.

More Space in Zeppelins

"The airplane will never be able to provide for passengers the space which we provide on the Zeppelins; passenger space is an important factor in comfort.

"The Graf Zeppelin was designed as an experimental ship, which accounts for its limited space given over to passengers. The Hindenburg, on the other hand, was designed as a passenger ship, thus the ample quarters which are provided in her hull. We see now from the experience of the season what additional comforts are desirable, and in designing and equipping the Zeppelins which are to come we shall profit by that experience.

"As a sister ship, the LZ-130 will be equipped with passenger quarters which will differ only in minor details from those of the Hindenburg. We decided against substantial innovations to get the ship into the air as soon as possible.

As to the expected "reasonable increase" in Zeppelin speed, Captain Lehmann said:

"We have been quite satisfied with the time we have made with the Hindenburg during the last season. We had estimated between sixty and seventy hours for the westward crossing, and between fifty and sixty hours for the return trip. Our averages for the season were: for the westward crossing, less than sixty-four hours, and for the eastward crossing, less than fifty-two hours.

"We know that we can better this average, even with the Hindenburg.

"The future traveller by airplane across the north Atlantic will lose at least one business day. He who will go by Zeppelin will lose but two. Undoubtedly many persons will gladly lose the second day to enjoy the superior comforts which the Zeppelin provides.

"The time may come when we shall be able to make the eastward crossing in thirty-six hours, with the loss to the passenger of only one business day.

"Weather has an important bearing on speed, of course, and our experience during the last season with the weather has been invaluable.

"During the westward crossing the strength of the head-winds is an important factor, and it is our problem to avoid head-winds and to get the advantage of tail-winds.

"As I explained at the end of the second westward crossing last spring, we were badly delayed after having been caught on the wrong side of a 'low.'

"Hitherto more frequent reports in the western-Atlantic area have not been necessary. But with the coming of airplane service between Europe and America, greater frequency will be desirable in the interests of all. It happened that we were the first to discover the desirability, says the New York Herald Tribune. I understand that the service is now being expanded to provide four reports a day.

"I have said that next season we intend to speed up the Hindenburg's motors. Her Mercedes-Benz Diesel engines have given an excellent account of themselves. Improvements are being made from time to time, so that we can look forward to still greater speed from the motors to be installed in our future Zeppelins—those to come after the LZ-130. The latter ship will make approximately the same speed as the Hindenburg."

Reason Enough

"There's one encouragement about trans-Atlantic flights?"

"What's that?"

"A flier knows that no matter where he comes down, he'll land on page one for a day or so anyway!"

Social and Personal Notes

ENTERTAIN AT DINNER

The British Ambassador and Lady Clive entertained at dinner Tuesday for the British Secretary, Mr. H. Ashley Clarke, who left Tokyo today at 3 p.m. for a trip to England. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. J. R. McKenlay, Mr. and Mrs. B. Caiger, Mr. and Mrs. C. Wild, Miss Virginia Bell, Miss Mildred Teusler and Mr. J. A. Pilcher. Mr. Clarke expects to return to Japan in April.

AMERICAN SCHOOL OPENS

The American School in Japan started its new term after the year-end holidays today.

RETURN TO KOBE

Mr. and Mrs. Kitching, who have been visiting in Tokyo, returned to Kobe by the 1 p.m. train Tuesday. Mrs. Kitching will be remembered by old residents of Tokyo as the sister of Mr. Hubert Bunton who is now residing in England.

AT NIKKO FOR NEW YEAR

Viscountess Fujinami and her sister Mrs. D. M. Nicolau spent part of the New Year holidays at Ito.

AT LAKE KAWAGUCHI

The British Ambassador and Lady Clive spent the New Year holidays at Lake Kawaguchi.

TO BE AT HOME

The Netherlands Minister, General C. J. Pabst, will be at home to all Netherlands subjects in Tokyo and Yokohama from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. Thursday on the occasion of the marriage of H.R.H. Princess Juliana of the Netherlands to Prince Bernhard van Lippe Biesterseld.

IN HOSPITAL

Mrs. H. Tarzi, wife of the Afghan Minister, entered St. Luke's Medical Center Tuesday where she will be under the observation of a specialist for several days.

Sadanji Is Star At Tokyo Gekijo

is a dance, "Yumiya-Taro" with Ennosuke taking the leading role and his son, Danshiro, giving him able support. It provides the comedy relief of the evening. Ennosuke is Yumiya-Taro, who because he is a coward by nature always carries a bow and arrow to impress people that he is brave. Danshiro takes the part of Matsubei, a villager, who plots to scare the life out of Yumiya-Taro. He dares him to go to a forest near a shrine late at night and leave his fan on the branch of a tree as proof, after telling the bluffing Yumiya-Taro that he had seen an ogre there. And he offers the hand of his sister if he accomplishes it, and if he doesn't then he is to serve as his kitchen servant for the rest of his life. Yumiya-Taro has gone too far with his bluffing that he cannot withdraw and he accordingly sets out.

Matsubei wears a mask of his conception of the ogre and goes to the forest to scare Yumiya-Taro. Meanwhile Yumiya-Taro has been advised by his mother that there is no such thing as an ogre in existence but he nevertheless wears a weird mask with the view to frightening away the fiend if he should appear. Matsubei and Yumiya-Taro meet abruptly at the forest and both fall into a swoon in extreme horror. But it is Yumiya-Taro who comes to his senses first, and seeing torches approaching, he hides behind a tree. Villagers arrive and they bring Matsubei back to his senses. Realizing that he had been the target of a mischievous plan, Yumiya-Taro appears and wreaks revenge by frightening the villagers to his heart's content, all by a stroke of luck. Ennosuke and Danshiro give a performance that is most satisfying.

During the dance, Ennosuke introduced one of his pupils, Joyen, who appeared in the role of an attendant to Matsubei's sister.

Sadanji is featured in "Narukami", a classical play in one act, as Saint Narukami, who shuts up the deity of rain in the mountains by incantation, but is defeated of his purpose by the wiles of a beautiful lady sent from the capital to break his spell.

Koshiro takes the leading role in "Banzuin-Chobei" a play in three acts by Kawatake Kokuami, based on a group of chivalrous people during the Yedo period who fought against the corruption of certain retainers of the Shogun. Despite his 68 years, Koshiro proves that he is best fitted for such a role as Banzuin Chobei, who in the final scene is treacherously killed while he is about to take a bath in the home of his enemy.

It is all Nizaemon in "Hidakagawa," the final number of the program, a classical dance in one act. His dancing as Kiyoshime, the lovelorn maiden, in the style of the puppet show is truly that of a great artist and should not be missed. Tosshi gives him able support as the ferryman who refuses her passage across the river. Extreme jealousy at the thought that she had been spurned by the young priest, who has ordered the ferryman not to transport her across the river, turns herself into a snake, according to the story, and it swims across the river in chase of the priest.

The other play on the program is "Okumi-to-Yohei" in one act by Shin Hasegawa, featuring Nizaemon and Ennosuke.—L.N.

Crosby Film Marks Burns' Screen Bow

Escape From You," "The House That Jack Built For Jill," "If You Can't Sing It You'll Have to Swing It," "Empty Saddles," "Roundup Lullaby" and "I'm an Old Cow Hand From the Rio Grande." "Rhythm on the Range," a seventh tune by Richard Whiting and Walter Bullock, was prompted by the film.

Thuggery of Warren Hymer, George E. Stone and James Burke, adds a touch of comedy suspense to the transcontinental romance of Crosby and Miss Farmer. The trio trail them across the United States, planning to kidnap the society girl and hold her for ransom.

Samuel S. Hinds and Lucille Webster Gleason, who plays Miss Farmer's thoroughly Western aunt, lead the list of the skilled players grouped around the principals. Norman Taurog directed the picture, which was adapted for the screen from an original by Mervin J. Houser.

Deeds Not Words Are Proposed For Aiding Americas

Population Of 252,000,000 Estimated In 21 Republics Forming Union

On the basis of the latest statistical information, it is possible to calculate the population of each of the 21 republics forming the Pan American Union in the following way, in alphabetical order:

Argentina	12,000,000
Bolivia	3,400,000
Brazil	43,000,000
Chile	4,500,000
Colombia	8,000,000
Costa Rica	500,000
Cuba	4,000,000
Dominican Republic	1,000,000
Ecuador	2,000,000
Guatemala	2,000,000
Haiti	2,300,000
Honduras	900,000
Mexico	17,000,000
Nicaragua	850,000
Panama	500,000
Paraguay	1,000,000
Peru	6,200,000
Salvador	1,800,000
United States	125,000,000
Uruguay	2,000,000
Venezuela	3,100,000

The total is some 242,000,000 and if, as would be natural from a viewpoint of geography and economic reality, we add the 10,500,000 of Canada, there are approximately 252,000,000 inhabitants of the American world who can be said to be saturated with the idea of forming a precise and already well-defined section in the universal frame of humanity.

Wastes No Illusions

Citing these population figures, Galvarino Gallardo Nieto, noted Chilean publicist, declared that the international influence of the United States, combined with "consistent spiritual factors" in the other American republics, is a guarantee of doctrinal stability in the Buenos Aires negotiations for the consolidation of peaceful New World relationships. The good neighbor policy, enunciated, he says, and almost enobled by President Roosevelt, would be sufficient defense of Pan-Americanism if it could be converted into a customs system which permitted the free development of the natural resources of each of the 21 republics and recognized the advantages of the effective fraternal union of all of them.

Gallardo regretted, however, that the old Spanish saying "Obras son amores y no buenas razones" could be scrupulously applied to the problem of the economic relationships of the Americas, because no practical justification was to be found in beautiful speeches, brilliant articles and voluminous books.

Urges Something Practical

What was more important, he said, was to reach positive agreements, sincere and workable, which would modify the nationalistic tariff regime of practically all nations assembled in Buenos Aires.

Gallardo appealed for an end of "diplomatic verbalism"—a shoreless ocean, he alleged, in Pan-America—which had stimulated excessive hopes and caused great disappointments because of vague promises impossible of fulfilment. While the richest and most-populated American countries refused to modify the policies which limited the economic possibilities of the smaller nations, and while these, in turn, imposed prohibitions which restricted world interchange, it would be impossible to achieve the ideal of collective harmony among these powers, he declared.

Relative justification was seen for a European tariff war because a war is "inevitable" on that continent and each country must try to become self-sufficient; but this is not accepted as a valid reason for extending economic hostilities to the New World.

Speeches and Reality

Unfortunately, however, "speeches and writings on continental fraternity do not go hand in hand with realities of commercial policy in these countries.

"Diplomats," according to Gallardo, "travel along one road pronouncing peace superlatives and lauding benefits imposed by geography and racial and historical similarities, but are sidetracked by the slaves of industry, agriculture and commerce, who persist in the contradictory and utopian enterprise of selling the maximum to and buying the minimum from the rest."

The nobly-inspired doctrine of the "good neighbor" is declared by the Latin authority to have been completely frustrated in the world of economic realities. And tariff policy is the sole reason, he adds:

"The great development and the overshadowing prosperity of the United States was based principally on tariff liberty within its vast geographical limits. There was and is free interchange between the Atlantic and Pacific states, despite the thousands of miles and several days of railroad travel that separate them. There are no tariff obstacles.

Says Trade Choked

"The trade between the Atlantic and Pacific countries of South America, however, has been choked by artificial restrictions. There is little left of commerce between Chile and Argentina, only a few hours separated by rail, but the diplomatic refrain of bilateral harmony is still sung by diplomats of both countries."

Gallardo insisted that true American peace would only be found by tackling "first things first." The unshackling of American trade will bring American peace, in his opinion, and it is futile to prepare for the trade that will follow peace organization. His pessimistic picture of present-day conditions was a shock to several of the Latin-American delegates hurrying to the Buenos Aires conference:

"Every American republic cultivates the terrible weed of tariff war in the name of private egoistic conveniences. Patriotism within the frontiers of each country is exploited to induce the people to live regardless of their neighbors. Nobody can cross the many frontiers without a passport, which costs days, even weeks, to obtain. Tariffs and barriers reduce Pan-Americanism to a very small matter, despite the eloquence of continental solidarity. Progress along this inviting road will be exceedingly slow while the practical aspects of the work are abandoned."

Britain Is Tied By 10 Treaties With Portugal

Old Pact Says London Must Aid Lisbon If Attacked, Study Reveals

Britain has very big—though not quite unconditional — liability to maintain the integrity both of Portugal itself and of all the vast colonial possessions which that country has in different parts of the world and especially in tropical Africa.

Mr. Anthony Eden, British Foreign Secretary, made this important fact clear in a recent House of Commons statement which has escaped the attention of the London press generally, says the Christian Science Monitor.

This statement has significant bearing upon the very live question of the extent to which Britain would be involved in the event of any attack either from Spain or other country upon Portugal itself or by any land-hungry power upon Portuguese colonies.

Treaties of Assistance

Mr. Eden said that no new guarantee of any kind had been given to the Portugese Government, but in response to an inquiry from Lisbon last August, an assurance had been made that the British "have always admitted and still admit the validity of the treaties between themselves and Portugal." He added that Britain "retained the right of judging the circumstances in which assistance might be given under these treaties."

The reservation made by Mr Eden, the Monitor understands, is in consequence of the fact that under the Covenant of the League of Nations to which both Britain and Portugal adhere, all treaties between these two peoples are subject to the over-riding condition that no war can be engaged in that is not within the framework of the League.

This means that if Portugal were attacked, Britain would go to its assistance only if Article XVI of the Covenant of the League had first been brought into operation. This article comes into operation only after the situation concerned has been brought before the League, and after a decision has been taken in accordance with the procedure of that body, to the effect that an act of unprovoked aggression has occurred. In this decision Britain itself has the right to decide whether these conditions have been fulfilled.

Dates Back to 1373

This, while technically reducing the British liability to go to war on Portugal's behalf, would not affect the situation if conditions arose in which any attack was made upon Portugal comparable to that from which Ethiopia has recently suffered.

Apart from this, the Anglo-Portuguese alliance is of the most binding character. It depends, the Monitor learns authoritatively, upon the "Treaty of Peace, Friendship and Alliance" signed at London so long ago as June 16, 1373, and on certain articles confirming and supplementing that treaty as signed in 1386, 1642, 1654, 1660, 1661, 1703, 1815, 1899 and 1904.

The 1373 treaty bound the two countries "to maintain and uphold each other mutually by sea and by land," also in the event of invasion or threat of invasion to send men and ships to the help of the one attacked.

The 1386 treaty engaged both sides "to succour and afford aid to the other against all men who should attempt to violate the peace of the other" excepting only against "the Pope and his successors, the King of the Romans and the King of Castile and Leon."

Other Confirmatory Pacts

The 1642 and 1654 treaties confirmed the alliance of 1386.

The 1660 treaty confirmed the treaty of 1654.

The treaty of 1661 pledged Britain "to defend and protect all conquests or colonies belonging to the Crown of Portugal against all his enemies, as well future as present."

The treaty of 1703 brought Holland into the alliance. It also mentioned France and Spain specifically as powers against which protection might have to be afforded mutually.

The agreements of 1815 and 1899 were confirmative.

The 1904 agreement reaffirmed "the friendship and alliance which have happily subsisted for so long a period between them"—Britain and Portugal. This agreement also provided for referring any legal differences or interpretation of treaties to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague.

The only estriction upon Brtish responsibility for maintaining the integrity of Portuguese territory, therefore, lies in the United Kingdom's commitments to the League of Nations covenant.

Colonies Don't Pay, Britain's Analysis Shows

Returns Reveal Foreign Importations Equal Empire Total

The recent assertion in Germany that if the Reich had only a small fraction of Great Britain's colonial empire she would have all the raw material she needs, has aroused much discussion in London, according to the Christian Science Monitor. Such a statement was made in one instance recently by Col. Gen. Hermann Goering.

So far as Great Britain herself is concerned, General Goering's statement may be put precisely the other way round.

Last year, as indeed in previous years, all the British colonies produced only a fraction of the raw materials which Britain uses. Even if the much more numerous products of the self-governing Dominions and India are thrown in with those of Britain's colonial empire, they only account for about two-fifths of British imports of raw materials and foodstuffs. If raw materials alone are considered, the proportion of foreign to imperial imports is equally high.

Dividing Up Imports

The British Board of Trade returns do not show British imports grouped under the heads of Empire and non-Empire goods. An analysis of the official statistics for 1935, in order to establish how much of Britain's food and raw material imports come from the Colonies, shows how much from British India, how much from the Dominions, and how much from foreign countries. The result of this analysis will probably surprise most people who have not made a close study of the question.

Taking raw materials and articles unmanufactured first, it is learned that in 1935 Britain imported altogether £211,758,000 worth of goods under this head. Foreign countries were responsible for £130,038,000 of this total; the British Dominions, £42,410,000; British India, £14,774,000 and the Colonial Empire, properly so-called, £24,421,000.

The odd £15,000 is accounted for by the omission of fractions of £1000 when adding up imports of the individual countries.

Metals for Germany?

According to the indications of Reich's spokesmen Germany would presumably be most interested in are metals, such as iron, tin, nickel, copper, and so forth. So far as iron ore is concerned, Great Britan imported £5,000,000 worth in 1935, of which only £311,000 came from all the British countries, Dominions and India included. Sweden and Algeria supplied £770,000 each: Spain £890,000; various smaller items made up the full total.

British imports of non-ferrous metal ores amounted to £11,622,000 of which no less than £7,141,000 came from foreign sources. Apart from copper ore and tungsten, of which Canada and British India (neither of them colonies) respectively supplied the major portion, the ore suppliers were mostly foreign countries. Bolivia supplied about 60 per cent of the tin ore and the British colony of Nigeria about 20 per cent.

Manufactured Goods

A large proportion of British unworked metal imports, however, appears not in the raw materials group but under the head of articles wholly or mainly manufactured. Analyzing these, we find that British India supplied £202,000, and "other British countries" £720,000 of manufactured iron and steel imports out of a total of £8,717,000. Belgium and Luxembourg between them were responsible for £3,251,000.

In the manufactured non-ferrous group, Great Britain got nearly all her aluminum, all her nickel, and about two thirds of her crude zinc from Canada as well as nearly half her copper. About 30 per cent of the manufactured tin—which includes ingots, bars and slabs—came from British colonial countries.

Tin in, fact, is the only metal which Great Britain is at present obtaining in large quantities from her colonial empire. But even of this metal more than two thirds still comes from foreign countries, principally Bolivia.

Malaya Didn't Do It

No doubt Nigeria and Malaya between them could have supplied the whole of Britain's tin needs. But the fact remains that they didn't. Evidently it was better business—this is especialy true of Malaya—to sell a good part of their tin output elsewhere.

On the question of gold, concerning which General Goering stated that Germany's stocks had been "stolen" in reparations, it is difficult to disentangle the facts from the official statistics. Britain imported in 1935 £47,200,000 in unrefined gold bullion and exported £12,800,000. She also imported £130,200,000 of refined bullion and exported £146,500,000. It is not clear in either case how much of the gold in question was newly mined and how much merely transferred from bank vaults or the pockets of hoarders.

Hoarders Disgorge

Of the unrefined gold, the greater portion, £34,600,000, came from India, where hoarders had evidently been induced to disgorge by the high prices offered on the London market. Two colonies, British West Africa and Southern Rhodesia, sent, respectively, £130,000 and £1,192,000 of what must have been new gold. The Union of South Africa sent nearly £70,000,000 of refined gold, which must also have been freshly mined, but the Union, of course, is not a colony.

It is hard to see, therefore, how Germany could have replenished her stocks of gold from the British colonial empire even if she had possessed the whole of it.

In this connection a British M. P., Mr. Herbert Williams, has pointed out that according to the published returns of the Reichsbank, Germany's stocks of gold actually trebled between 1924 and 1931, which was the period in which she was paying reparations. At the end of 1924, that is to say, immediately after reparations began, the Reichsbank's gold stocks were given as 760,000,000 Reichsmarks. In May, 1931, the month before reparations ceased, they stood at no less than 2,390,000,000 Reichsmarks. At the end of September, 1936, the figure had shrunk right away to 63,000,000 Reichsmarks. It is generally understood that the shrinkage is not entirely due to purchases of butter.

Mr. G. R. van Osselen, Mr. A. Knottenbelt, and Mr. W. M. de Haan have invited all fellow countrymen to a cocktail party today on the occasion of the marriage of H. R. H. Princess Juliana of the Netherlands to Prince Bernhard van Lippe Biestesfeld.

HOSTS AT DINNER

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Tower were hosts at dinner Monday for Mr. Alvin Rowe. Their guests included Mr. and Mrs. Garland Richardson, Mr. Stanley G. Slavens, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Warner, Mrs. Carol Holbrook and Mr Carey Scott.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSO WILL ARRIVE SOON

Mr. Mischa Elman, world famous violinist will arrive in Yokohama accompanied by his secretary on board the N.Y.K. liner Chichibu Maru early Friday morning from San Francisco. His recitals will be held at the Hibiya Public Hall, Tokyo January 21, 22, 26 and 27.

Mr. Elman and his secretary will stay at the Imperial Hotel during this month.

STAYING AT IMPERIAL HOTEL

Mr. W. M. Gray, Secretary of the Austral-Asiatic Section of the Australian Institute of International Affairs, arrived in Japan Tuesday from the United States and is staying at the Imperial Hotel. He will remain in Tokyo for about a week.

TO RETURN TO TOKYO

Miss Malla Siwertz who has been skiing with a party from Kobe at Shigakoen expects to return to Tokyo Sunday, January 10.

ENTERTAIN AT DINNER

The American Consul-General and Mrs. Arthur Garrells entertained at dinner Tuesday in honor of Mr. Alvin Rowe, American Vice-Consul, who will leave Tokyo Friday for his new post at Taihoku. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Richard F. Boyce, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Tower, Mr. and Mrs. Gregor C. Merrill, Mrs. Carol Holbrook; Miss Dorothy Tugwell, Mr. Stanley G. Slavens, Mr. Gerald Warner and Mr. Gordon Jorgensen.

PROCURATOR-GENERAL MOTOJI REPORTS TO ISE GRAND SHRINE

Dr. Niikuma Motoji, new procurator-general, will leave Tokyo Station for the Kansai at 10:30 p.m. Friday in order to report to the Ise Grand Shrines and Imperial mausoleums on assumption of his post as procurator-general.

On his way, Dr. Motoji is also expected to inspect the courts of appeals at Osaka and Nagoya, and the local district courts at Ohtsu, Nara and Kyoto. He is expected to return to Tokyo on January 15.

THREE STATE MINISTERS GO TO KYOTO

Finance Minister Dr. Eiichi Baba, Railways Minister Yonezo Mayeda and Agriculture and Forestry Minister Toshio Shimada, who paid their respects to Ise Grand Shrines Wednesday arrived in Kyoto by tramcar at 5:10 p.m. the same day and were greeted by many officials and civilians. Later they entered the Yoshitomi Hotel, near the Nanzenji Temple.

After worshiping at the Momoyama Mausoleum and the Iwashimizu-Hachiman Shrine today, the three ministers are to leave Kyoto Station for Tokyo at 1:35 p.m.

AT IMPERIAL HOTEL

New arrivals at the Imperial Hotel are:—Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Volny, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. A. Kauffeld, Miss B. and Miss L. Kauffeld, Mr. and Mrs. A. Bromer and Mr. and Mrs. Straube.

AT SANNO HOTEL

New arrivals at the Sanno Hotel are: Mr. and Mrs. K. Ishimatsu, Mr. and Mrs. Y. Yamada, Mr. R. Nango, Mr. H. Sakaya, Mr. L. Baird, Mr. J. Takeshita, Mr. Arthur Grebe, Mr. J. Schneegerger, Mr. L. Hochstetter, Mr. W. Muller, Mr. E. Lond, Mr. S. Nogami, Mr. G. Takitani, Mr. N. Imura, Mr. and Mrs. F. Shimakage, Mr. K. Watanabe, Mr. and Mrs. K. Nakamura, Mr. K. Sanada, Mr. and Mrs. T. Susuki, Mr. G. Imai, Mr. T. Takahashi, Mr. S. Nakai and Mr. M. Ogawa.

SENDAI NOTES

Miss Georgia Newbury, formerly a resident of Sendai, and Miss Phyllis Argall were guests over the New Year holidays of Misses Boyle and Jansen at the Aoba.

Miss Betty Stoudt, the Misses Alice and Esther McKnight, and Mr. James Fesperman were home for the vacation from the American School with their respective families.

Miss Lora Patten took an extended trip through the south visiting en route in Himeji and with Miss Mary Jessie, formerly of Sendai and now at the Seinan Jo Gakuin, Itozu, Kokura.

Mr. and Mrs. Course of Tokyo spent the New Year holidays as the house guests of the Stoudts.

Miss Harriet Smith had as her guest for a few days after Christmas Miss Marion Kane, of Kobe, and then spent the remainder of the vacation with her in Tokyo.

Mrs. Lamott and her children, Kenneth and Eleanor, spent several days in Sendai as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Fesperman.

Bishop and Mrs. Norman S. Binsted returned to Sendai for the major part of the holiday season, during which time they were the house guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Draper.

Mr. and Mrs. Divers spent New Year's at Nikko.

New Year's Eve parties were held at the homes of Mr. and Mrs. Stoudt and of the Misses Boyle and Jansen, with a large proportion of the foreign community in attendance at one place or the other.

Miss May Kanazawa, of Tokyo, was the guest of Miss Marie Leidal during the holiday season.

Mr. Charles LeGalley entertained the foreign community at a series of house-warming parties in his new apartment at 60 Kozenji-dori on the evenings of January 1 and 2.

Among the members of the foreign community who were in Tokyo at some time or other during the vacation were the Miss Hansen, Lindsey, Ilsley and Naefe, Dr. and Mrs. Paul L. Gerhard, Mr. Earle Griffith, Mr. Charles LeGalley, and Mr. Robert Gerhard.

Hoover Sees Peril Of Slump Like '29

Warns Engineers Cut In Prices Must Come Before Rise In Wages And Profits

Former President Hoover, in an address recently at the Hotel Astor New York City before a large group of distinguished fellow engineers, warned that the United States is headed for a debacle like that of 1929, "unless we can bring the intelligence and courage of the engineer into industrial statesmanship," says the New York Times.

"I am convinced," the former President said, "that when we fully understand the economic history of the period of the Twenties, we shall find that the debacle which terminated the end of another apparently highly prosperous period was largely contributed to by a failure of industry to pass its improvement (through labor-saving devices) on to the consumer; and I leave that subject for the moment with just this one word, and that is, we are headed in that same direction again today unless we can bring the intelligence and courage of the engineer into industrial statesmanship.

"If increased wages and profits are to absorb the savings which the engineer produces through his labor-saving devices and renewed and new methods, and there is not a reduction of price, which is essential to increasing consumption, thereby we are ourselves by our own neglect producing that mass of technological unemployment. Increasing prices merely because there is a rising demand defeats the very end which statesmanship requires in our industries at this time."

Pays Tribute to Swasey

Mr. Hoover spoke at the annual dinner of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers after the presentation of the Hoover Medal, named for the former President, to Ambrose Swasey of Cleveland, 89-year-old builder of giant telescopes and other astronomical and optical instruments and one of the most beloved figures in scientific and engineering circles.

The Hoover Medal is unique of its kind in that it does not recognize engineering accomplishments, but public service by an engineer. The legend on it reads: "Awarded by engineers to a fellow-engineer for distinguished public service."

The medal is awarded by the four national engineering societies known as the "Founder Societies," which include the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, the American Society of Civil Engineers, the American Institute of Electrical Engineers and the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers.

"This medal," Mr. Hoover said, "was especially dedicated to engineers that have carried the engineering banner of intellectual honesty and engineering devotion into public service. Mr. Swasey was doing his part as a citizen in those functions when we were boys.

"But in a larger sense our nation and the whole world today is passing great tests. Most of us believe that our social system must be maintained in its vital and essential principles if human progress is to continue. But the problems which confront us today are, indeed, the problems created by the engineers themselves.

New Problems for Engineers

"New problems of public service come now into the field of the engineer. With the general rise of the engineer to executive position, the dependence upon engineers for clarity of thinking and planning, provision of works and enormous public services, we have to front the fact that these problems, which lie indeed even outside of government, must find their solution through engineering minds.

"We not only have the new problems of human relationship which the expansion of mass production and industry have brought upon us, but we have problems of industrial statesmanship in the conduct of these enterprises which now involve the fate of civilization if we fail to find their solution.

"These are problems that can be solved only by the processes of engineers—the painstaking collection of fact, of experiments, the determination of proportional weight of factor and experience, and, above all, the intellectual honesty that confronts the end.

"And these problems today range far from pure engineering over into economics, and the engineer no longer can hold himself to mere design of plan or of administration, but must range out into this area of sociology and economics if we are to find these solutions.

"We have one phase of these problems confronting us this day which is peculiarly an obligation of engineers and yet lies more nearly in economics that it does in engineering.

"We have gone on and Dr. Swasey has made great contributions to our constant flood of labor-saving devices. For the whole of a century, engineers have been called upon to defend this action of the labor-saving device against the charge that it produces unemployment and human misery.

Offers "Economic Answer"

"We are confronted today with probably a larger proportion of technological unemployment than we have faced in many years. I scarcely need to state the economic answer to all that.

"New inventions and new articles increase the demand, increase the standard of living and of employment, and we know from a thousand experiences that in the older articles of production, through cheapening the costs, we decrease the price for the consumer, expand the consumption to the consumer, and thereby increase the standard of employment and, coincidentally, increase the economics of living, the standard of living.

"This is sound economics, but it depends only upon the time element, and, in the main, the increase of employment under the standard of living depends also on reducing the price of goods to the consumer, and here is where the engineer must range in the area of economics."

Mr. Hoover received an ovation from his fellow engineers. The opening of his speech produced general laughter when he remarked, after the applause:

"The thought just flashed over my mind that, not being on a radio hook-up, applause didn't cost any money."

Referring to introductory remarks made by Gano Dunn, chairman of the Hoover Medal Board of Award, who paid tribute to the accomplishments of Mr. Swasey as well as of Mr. Hoover, the former President brought forth further laughter when he said:

"I would like to say something about Mr. Swasey also, because I don't feel that Mr. Dunn has done an entirely adequate job in that direction, although he rather overdid it in my direction."

Also Gets German Medal

In addition to the Hoover Medal, Mr. Swasey also received the VDI Medal, given by the Society of German Engineers (Verein Deutscher Ingenieure-.

The presentation was made by Mr. Dunn. William L. Batt, outgoing president of the mechanical engineers, presided.

Another feature of the evening was the calling of the roll of eight engineers who have completed fifty years of membership in the A. S. M. E. They are Matthias A. Beck of Milwaukee, C. H. Foster of Troy, N. Y.; Norman D. Fraser of Los Angeles, Horace B. Gale of Natick, Mass.; George F. Higgins of Melrose, Mass.; Daniel E. Moran of New York City, John S. Unger of Chicago and William M. Whitney of Winchendon, Mass. Only Mr. Foster and Mr. Moran were present.

Another speaker was Dr. Harlow Shapley, director of the Harvard College Observatory, who reviewed the advances made in astronomy during the past ninety years.

Professor Shapley, who delivered the annual Thurston lecture, pointed to the coincidence that the planet Neptune was discovered in the year in which Mr. Swasey was born. Astronomy ninety years ago, he said, was chiefly concerned with the solar system, because astronomers did not even suspect the existence of the vast systems of galaxies and supergalaxies that contain thousands of millions of stars, each vastly greater than the solar system.

The spectacular advances in astronomy, Dr. Shaply said, have been made possible by the association of astronomers and engineers, the latter having contributed their knowledge in the building of the giant telescopes, without which modern astronomy would be impossible. Mechanical and electrical engineering both are largely involved in the construction of the modern "heavenly chariots" on which man reams to the furthermost reaches of his universe.

Tribute Paid to Hoover

Speaking of former President Hoover, Mr. Dunn said:

"For reasons which all will appreciate at this time, the acts of his administration as President are not here invoked as instances of the public service of an engineer, but his career since his return to private life has again afforded outstanding evidence of his devotion to the public welfare.

"As a private citizen he has stirred the nation with his contributions to the philosophy of government and with the broad knowledge he has brought to bear in the discussions of recent issues. His devotion to human welfare has again sent him to the front in the role of champion of that personal liberty in support of which our forefathers mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor."

Mr. Swasey made his fortune, according to his own description, from "making turret lathes for profit" as a result of technical skill gained by making telescopes for astronomers without profit.

In 1914 Mr. Swasey gave $500,000 to establish the Engineering Foundation, to which he has since added another $250,000. He is a member of many scientific and engineering societies. He became 90 on Dec. 19.

French Debt Cut Opposed By Borah

Further Concessions By U.S. Would Aid Rearmament, Says Senator

Opposition to scaling down the French debt and insistence on legislation for Federal incorporation of industries were high points in an interview Senator Borah gave recently upon his return to Washington to begin his seventh term in the United States Senate, of which he is the dean, according to the New York Times.

Elected with one of his largest majorities last November when President Roosevelt swept Idaho, Senator Borah seemed to be in the best of spirits, determined to apply himself to legislative matters. He eschewed discussion of the failure of the Republican party in November and declined to lay down a formula for its reorganization.

Asked about the future of the party he replied with a sarcastic smile:

"There is nothing I can say except what I ought not to say."

He believes that the party must find policies first and new leaders will come. In the meantime its members in Congress, he holds, can do very little "except to support measures which seem proper and to scrutinize legislation."

"I am opposed to reducing the French debt agreements," he said. "We would have no assurance that they would pay if the debts were scaled down to ten cents on the dollar. This money belongs to the American taxpayer and we were generous in the terms now in effect.

Favors Present Agreement

"The terms were adopted after all facts and the ability of the country to pay had been considered. I am satisfied that the present agreement ought to be lived up to. What we ask France to pay is about what we loaned her after the Armistice. Great Britain has some reason to ask for a reduction in view of the more liberal allowances given other nations."

Senator Borah said he thought that France was seeking new terms in order to avoid the stigma of repudiation. He said he had no facts to justify a conclusion that France sought to pay the debt on reduced terms so she might qualify under the Johnson resolution to float loans in this country. He added if these debts are scaled down it gave the countries involved more money for armaments.

He advanced the opinion that the Supreme Court decision in New York's Minimum Wage Law might lead to an agitation for amendment of the Constitution to permit States to fix hours and wages.

"I do not say I would support such an amendment," he added quickly. "Such an amendment would open the door on all the power of the State and break down the dual system of State and Federal government. I would hesitate a long time before supporting it. I am for social security legislation. It is necessary to the whole structure of civilization and I am also firm for the dual system of government."

Wants Industry Regulated

Federal regulation and chartering of industries engaged in interstate commerce, for which he already has introduced a bill, the Idaho Senator said, would be pressed by him and others. Senator O'Mahoney has a bill for the same purpose which the department has reported as unconstitutional. Senator Borah said that he thought his proposal would stand a constitutional test.

He wants industries regulated chiefly to control monopolies, which, he said, cannot be reached so easily under the anti-trust laws.

Under the terms of his bill Federal charters would be issued to industries engaged in interstate commerce and they would be subject to regulation by the Federal Trade Commission.

While his bill does not provide that wages and hours of labor should be regulated by the Federal Government, he said this could be done legally under such legislation.

He approved President Roosevelt's speech at Buenos Aires and said that the Monroe Doctrine was not so important as in the past. As to neutrality laws, the Senator said he favored strengthening them wherever possible, "to keep this country out of foreign wars."

While opposed to continuance of the reciprocal trade agreements which will expire in June, Senator Borah said there was no chance to stop an extension of the law.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

New Popularity Of Bicycles Is Problem

ties are recommended by the Safety Council.

What to Do and Not Do

Some of the does and don'ts the Council urges upon bicycle riders are:

1. Never carry persons or bulky bundles on a bicycle.
2. Never hang on a moving vehicle.
3. Do not try to carry an object in one hand or to ride without handle-bars.
4. Ride without wobbling and avoid sharp turns.
5. In making left turns, do not cut the corner.
6. Keep close to the right on all pavement.
7. Never ride more than two abreast; when meeting vehicles, ride in single file.
8. At signalized intersections, stop behind automobiles.
9. Watch for and obey stop signs.
10. Do not stunt ride on the streets.

As safety equipment for bicycles the Council lists:

1. Adequate lights, both front and rear.
2. Coaster brakes.
3. Seats, handle-bars, grips and pedal pads should be kept tight.
4. White or very light colored clothes are an advantage at night.
5. Clips to prevent trousers from catching in the sprocket.

An example in educating for safe cycling habits is furnished by the telegraphic companies. The Western Union requires daily inspection of bicycles for lights and brakes, the wearing of white raincoats in stormy weather. A regular training period is provided for all new boys. There are safety meetings and contests. Messengers are repeatedly told that obedience to traffic rules is their protection.

On the question of lights. No automobile is made today without them. Then why, says the National Safety Council magazine Public Safety, should not factories be required to outfit bicycles with lights adequate for them to meet the traffic problems of today?

French Plane Shot Down

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, Jan. 3—Foreign Minister Julio Alvarez Delvayo of Spain has officially notified the French charge d'affaires at Valencia that he is in possession of proofs of a French plane, with French pressman aboard, having been shot down by the insurgents, according to information reaching here today.

The French plane, it is reported, was attacked by some rebel planes shortly after the machine hopped off from the Alcala Henares airdrome.

In his communication, the Spanish Foreign Minister is reported to have suggested to the French Government to institute a joint inquiry into the matter.

S. S. PANPURA

The P. and O. S.S. Panpura will sail from Yokohama at 8 p.m. Tuesday, January 12 instead of at noon that day.

TO REMAIN LONGER IN JAPAN

Mr. P. Kodanda Rao, of the Servants of India Society, will stay in Tokyo till January 17 at the Y.M.C.A., Kanda. He will go to Kobe on January 17 and leave there for Shanghai by the N.Y.K. liner Nagasaki Maru January 23.

ON BOARD HAKUSAN MARU

Passengers arriving on board the N.Y.K. liner Hakusan Maru at 8:30 a.m. Saturday at Kobe are Mr. E. Schneider, Engineering Director Nippon Diesel Engineering, Tokyo, and Mrs. Schnieder; Mrs. Miller and Mrs. C. S. Ogilvie.

ENTERTAINED AT LUNCHEON

The Soviet Ambassador and Mrs. C. Youreneff entertained at a luncheon Thursday at the Embassy. Their guests were the Swedish Minister and Mrs. Hultman and Miss Hultman; the Czechoslvoakian Minister, Mr. Havlicek; the Finnish Minister and Mrs. Valvanne; the Iranian Minister and Mrs; Azimi; the Rumanian Minister and Mrs. Stoicesco; the Secretary of the Swedish Legation, Mr. Wistrand; the Czechoslovakian Counsellor, Dr Havel Havelka and Mr. N. Rayvid, the Counsellor of the Embassy of USSR.

LONDON MARRIAGE

According to word received here, Miss Tamara Pringsheim, niece of Professor Klaus Pringsheim of The Tokyo Academy of Music, was married in London last month to Mr. Theodor Estermann, young British scholar of mathematics. The young Mrs. Estermann is the daughter of Dr. Heinz Pringsheim and the late Mme. Olga Markovna-Merson.

HOSTS AT DINNER

The Canadian Minister and Mrs. Bruce entertained at dinner Thursday and their guests were: the British Ambassador and Lady Clive, the Finnish Minister and Mrs. Valvanne, the Rumanian Minister and Mrs. Stoicesco, the Norwegian Minister and Mrs. Coren, the British Counsellor and Mrs. J. L. Dodds, the British Military Attache and Mrs. F. S. G. Piggott, the German Military Attache and Mrs. Eugen Ott, the French Military Attache and Mrs. C. E. Mast, Captain Yamagata, Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Dunnett, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Curtis, the Canadian secretary, Mr. James Langley, the Canadian Secretary and Mrs. d'Arcy McGreer, Miss Virginia Bell, Miss Mildred Teusler and Mr. Francis Pigott.

SATISFACTORY RECOVERY PREDICTED

Satisfactory recovery was predicted for Mrs. Stuart Lillico from the fractured skull at the St. Luke's Medical Center Thursday. Mrs. Lillico has now regained consciousness and is able to speak a little. How long it will take for complete recovery cannot be stated yet but if her present improvement continues she will be able to see visitors in about a week.

ENTERTAIN AT DINNER

The Swiss Minister and Mrs. Thurnheer entertained at dinner Thursday at which their guests were the Swedish Minister and Mrs. Hultman and their daughter, the Portuguese Minister and Mrs. Mello, the Czechoslovak Minister, Mr. Frantisek Havlicek, Danish Minister and Baroness Bertouch-Lehn the Polish charge d'affaires, Mr. Jacek Trawinski, the Argentine charge d'affaires, Mr. Arturo A. Nazist Activities In S.W. Africa Given a Legislative Assembly, and Executive Committee, and an Advisory Council, the Legislative Assembly consisting of 18 members, 12 elected and six appointed by the Administrator, who is nominated by the Union Government. This system of government has proved unworkable, the immediate cause being the refusal of the Germans to cooperate.

A raid on the National-Socialist Party's Windhoek headquarters was made by the police in 1934, and the documents found there and impounded were used in evidence before the Union Commission. The Commission found that the German discontent had been inspired from the Foreign Department of the National-Socialist Party in Berlin. The Germans tax the Administration with deliberately outnumbering them by the introduction of Union settlers under its Land Settlement scheme, and with a policy of commercial exploitation of the Territory for the benefit of Union trading interests. The Union section of the population, charge the Germans with disloyalty and abuse of a dual nationality.

For all practical purposes the Union may be considered to be permanently invested with the administration of South-West Africa. But German hopes of return of the colony remain unimpaired. Germans in South-West Africa have nothing to lose and, as they see it, much to gain from the present impasse.

If the country were handed over a large proportion of its imports could be supplied, and almost all its exports absorbed, by the Fatherland, with a favorable effect on the Reich's balance of external payments. But this ignores both payments for imports of foodstuffs into the Territory, and also the whole question of compensation to those who have invested in the country since 1920. How could funds for this purpose be raised? Under the existing German-South African Trade Agreements, the Reich secures a large and various supply of African raw materials for which payment is made in German manufactures. This makes the commercial benefits which would accrue to Germany from the restoration of South-West Africa seem partly illusory.

Mechanized Army To Undergo Test

Efficiency Of Motorization And Smaller Units Is Expected To Be Demonstrated

WASHINGTON.—Military experts have been interested recently by two developments. One was the announcement of the Secretary of War, Mr. Woodring, that a "practical test" would be made next Summer of the efficiency of a wartime division reduced in size by half as compared with the World War strength of 27,000; the other, a few days later, centered about allegations published in Germany to the effect that our motor tanks and motorized transports were inadequate.

Army officers familiar with our ordnance confidently await the "practical test." Down to the rawest rookie—and the army has only a few more to go before attaining a strength of 165,000 to build up to the number approved and appropriated for by Congress—the interest in the coming "test" is keen, for it will deal with the soldier's increased power through improved mechanisms.

Three principal factors are behind the proposed change:

(1) Tactical mobility.

(2) Increased fire power.

(3) More abundant and efficiently trained man power.

Fewer Men and Animals

Where the World War division strength was about 27,000 (there was no fixed maximum) the proposed new division will be composed of 672 officers and 12,839 enlisted men. There will be no such thing as a brigade, but there will be officers with the rating of brigadier general. That will be necessary because the army leaders plan no change for the present in the established promotion system.

A wartime division was, in a way, a world unto itself. It moved with supplies, combat troops, its signal corps and other components, and it moved slowly. Upward of 27,000 men, they carried with them even supplies that were probably never to be used.

Animal-drawn wagons and ambulances, nearly 400 of them, were used to carry supplies and to evacuate wounded, although motors were beginning to be used in greater numbers. But the animal was "dependable." Motor vehicles broke down through mechanical trouble or became bogged in mud. The speed of an animal is only fifteen miles a day, but animal transport—used mostly at night—was the most certain method of moving supplies from the rail head to the combat troops.

Perhaps the person of military service age today wonders why the old divisions could not be motorized and mechanized. They could, War Department experts say, but they too would be unwieldy. Theoretically, and in practice next Summer it is expected, the 13,000-man division can be moved with more dispatch and more deadly effect than the slow, old larger division.

Equipped with modern weapons, from semi-automatic shoulder rifles to trench mortar and mobile howitzers, the fire effect will be enhanced to an extent realized only by military officers, says the New York Times. Overhead and working almost as a unit of the mobile ground forces, great bombers with the speed of pursuit craft and smaller ground strafing attack planes will be found.

If the tests prove successful there will be no more occasion to hold reserve supplies just a few miles back of the combat lines. Men and provisions can be held in safety 100, probably 200, miles behind. Commanding officers in the front lines will be assured of perfect communication, and they will know that needed help, if necessary, can be had for the asking.

Another consideration is that this proposed new motorized and mechanized force can strike with the fury and speed of a hornet, retire with speed and then attack from another advantageous point before the enemy can reassemble in attack formation.

Question of Mobility

Reduction of the division strength does not mean that more divisions will be called into action in time of emergency. The mobility and effectiveness of the smaller unit will be stronger than the larger division—more than twice as strong, it is expected.

In the new division to be tested there will be but three regiments of infantry. Field trains, band and howitzer company will be eliminated. The field artillery will be organized into one regiment, and the cavalry component will consist of a squadron of "motorized" cavalry as an organic part of the division.

Alien Wives Can Hits Career Men

Ambassadors And Ministers Are Not Subject To The New State Department Rule

WASHINGTON.—The executive order of President Roosevelt forbidding the marriage of Foreign Service career officers to aliens without permission of the State Department struck the service like a bombshell. Yet the regulation had long been contemplated.

The action was finally taken, after thorough consideration by the Foreign Personnel Board of the State Department, in the conviction that it was supported by strong reasons and by the precedent set by other nations, some of which have had longer experience than the United States in the management of foreign services.

127 Cases Found

Contrary to a fairly widespread impression, however, the order does not apply to Ambassadors and Ministers. Technically, they are not career diplomats, says the N. Y. Times. They are in the strictest sense members of the President's official family, in whose appointment the Chief Executive should have the widest latitude.

The restrictions apply only to the career officers, that is, to diplomatic counselors and secretaries and to Consuls General, Consuls and Vice Consuls. Clerks in the diplomatic service are affected, for the order states that no one shall be designated for an examination looking to appointment to the Foreign Service if married to an alien.

The desire was to discourage in the future the marriage of Foreign Service officers, whether men or women, to aliens. Yet it was realized that a too restrictive order might be undesirable. Consequently, it became the aim to make the terms elastic. Officials expect the result will be to discourage such foreign unions while leaving a loophole for exceptional cases.

"Official Family" Untouched

The board consists of Assistant Secretaries of State and Foreign Service officers on duty in the State Department. Before recommending the restrictive order, the board made a survey which showed that 18 per cent of Foreign Service career officers and 27 per cent of the clerks in the service were married to women not of American birth. Specifically, of the 684 Foreign Service officers, 127 married foreign-born women.

The efficiency of the Foreign Service depends not merely upon the qualifications of the officers in it but also upon their availability for service whenever and wherever needed. Our experience during the World War, in the opinion of the State Department, showed clearly how important it is that the availability of members of the service should be jealously guarded.

Many foreign governments have imposed marriage restrictions, written or unwritten, on their diplomatic and consular officers. This is true notwithstanding the marriage record of diplomats accredited to Washington. The wives of several of them are of American or other nationalities.

Soviets Deny Reports

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

MOSCOW, Jan. 3—Reports circulated by the Exchange Telegraph Agency alleging that the Soviet Union has been given exclusive rights to mining lead in the two rich provinces of Murcia and Ciudad Real, in southern Spain, in exchange for supplies of war materials to the Leftist Government are categorically denied by the Government here today.

The Tass News Agency, it is announced, has been authorized to state that charges concerning the receiving of any concessions in Spain are malicious inventions. The Government considers that any attempt on its part to obtain any kind of special privileges or rights in Spain is contrary to its principles.

have been all on the roseate side, but I find here respect for others and respect for oneself, among employes and employers. If the employe's respect for his chief seems exaggerated to anyone he would do well to learn what consideration the employe receives in return. He might also ponder over the possibility of there being no self-degradation in respect for others. And loyalty is something to be proud of.

Or if the modern feudalism which pervades the relationship of employe in Japan does not suit modern Western taste, there is the criterion of that good French word for employer—"patron." In English it means a guardian, a protector, an upholder. If all "patrons" were that there would be no need of unions, no reason for strikes. And in both hemispheres there are some who are.

Duce Advises Hitler

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

BERLIN, Dec. 30—Following reports that the Reich Government is openly assisting the movement of Nazi volunteers to Spain thereby threatening to further disrupt all non-intervention efforts regarding the Spanish civil war, it is reliably revealed here today that Premier Benito Mussolini of Italy has advised Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler to withdraw from Spain as gracefully as possible.

Competent observers declare that Il Duce reported advice to the Chancellor was made following Italy's decision to withdraw any further support to the insurgent element in Spain.

Madri Situation Told; Uncensored Story

their own skins to move to Valencia, Marcel Rosenberg, first Soviet bassador to the Spanish republic, was sitting in at all Cabinet council meetings.

In fact, his voice in these councils was generally understood to carry more authority even than that of the Premier, who has been manfully trying to live up to the title of the "Spanish Lenin," accorded to him by the trade union element of the Spanish Socialist party, which has always aligned itself solidly with the Third International.

It was Mr. Rosenberg who handpicked the Largo Caballero Cabinet, formed on Sept. 4, to succeed the manifestly impotent Giral government selected by President Manuel Azana himself largely from members of his own Left Republican party. Mr. Rosenberg decided that Julio Alvarez del Vayo, former Ambassador to Mexico and Premier Largo Caballero's right-hand man, should be Foreign Minister.

Named Envoy to Moscow

Mr. Alvarez del Vayo has written books about Soviet Russia, and in 1933, before the fall from power of Leftists led by Mr. Azana, he was named as the Spanish republic's first Ambassador to the Soviet Union. The victory of the Right at the general election in November, 1933, however, prevented Mr. Alvarez del Vayo from taking the post in Moscow.

Mr. Rosenberg is known to have insisted that Madrid defend itself after Toledo fell to the Insurgents and it became apparent that the capital would be General Franco's next objective. There was some inclination among the Loyalists as the enemy steadily advanced on the capital to urge the transfer of the seat of government to the Mediterranean seaport, but Mr. Rosenberg firmly vetoed this.

He was more instrumental than any one else in naming General Jose Asensio Under-Secretary of War under Premier and War Minister Largo Caballero. General Asensio was chosen to act as technical commander-in-chief of the unified government militia forces.

When the necessity to fortify Madrid and prepare its defenses confronted the Largo Caballero government a propaganda campaign, obviously inspired by Moscow's representatives, was launched on a big scale. Russian ships, loaded with food and clothing bought with funds raised by popular subscription in the Soviet Union, began to arrive at Barcelona, Valencia and Alicante.

Posters bearing huge portraits of Joseph Stalin and quoting his statement that it was the obligation of Russian Communists to aid their brothers in Spain, appeared all over the city. Other posters pointed out that early in the Bolshevist Revolution Petrograd was in even greater danger than Madrid but did not fall. Instead it survived to become the Leningrad of today despite the fact that revolutionary Russia at that time did not have the outside help which she is giving revolutionary Spain.

Soviet Films Are Shown

A gigantic portrait of Stalin was set up in the Puerta Del Sol facing the Interior Ministry. Only Russian propaganda films, such as "Kronstadt" were exhibited in Madrid's moving picture theaters. Ambassador Rosenberg, of course, attended the gala first night performances of these pictures and his arrival in a theater would be the signal for the audience to rise and sing the "Internationale" with fists raised in the Leftist salute.

Mr. Rosenberg attended mass meetings called as demonstrations of the fraternal solidarity existing between Russia and the Spanish Leftists. Seated on the platform with Mr. Alvarez del Vayo he invariably allowed the Foreign Minister of his choice to do the talking. He would merely acknowledge the Foreign Minister's flowery introductions with a few words of greeting in his soft, high-pitched voice. He is a gentle-mannered little man and in Madrid's exclusive Leftist press he is referred to as "Comrade Marcel."

Mr. Rosenberg was conspicuous among those present at the funerals of Commander Ristori and other Loyalist heroes killed in action. He usually stood beside Mr. Alvarez de Vayo or some other Cabinet Minister.

To arouse the fighting spirit of the people of Madrid the Foreign Minister said in October at one of the mass meetings in Mr. Rosenberg's honor that if Madrid fell the Loyalists would have lost the war. This phrase was incorporated in the text of a big poster which bore Mr. Alvarez del Vayo's portrait and was intended to stiffen Madrid's resistance to the Rebel onslaught.

Just about a month later "Comrade Marcel," General Jose Asensio, then the military chief; Mr. Alvarez del Vayo, who also was Chief Commissioner for War, and the rest of the new Largo Caballero Cabinet, including three anarcho-syndicalists, deemed it prudent to have all their mail forwarded to Valencia, according to the official statement issued then. The capture of Madrid by General Franco would be of relatively little strategic value to him and by no means would it end the war, it was stated then.

Although the people of Madrid know little about Russia it has become the fashion for them to do nearly everything in what they hope is the Russian manner. Government militiamen, receiving ten pesetas per day, eagerly purchase with their earnings peaked caps decorated with the Communist star, similar to those worn by soldiers in the Soviet Army. The regulation caps issued by the government to them with their uniforms resemble the overseas headgear worn by United States soldiers in the World War.

When Comrade Marcel first arrived in Madrid, he was installed with his staff in the Hotel Alfonso, but soon afterward was moved to the more luxurious Palace Hotel, which had been taken over by militia and converted supposedly into an "emergency hospital" a few days after the civil war began.

Stalin Keeping His Name Out Of Public's Eye

He Feels People Need No Idol To Replace Czar And Church Any Longer

MOSCOW, Dec. 6—Less and less the name of Josef Stalin is being featured in the development of the Soviet. That is the way Stalin wants it.

Although this has been apparent for many months, it was brought home most strikingly by the absence of Stalin's name from the thirty-five slogans approved by the Central Committee of the Communist party for use in the November celebration of the revolution.

No one believes that the move means Stalin is releasing any of his great power, but rather that he has turned to a more removed and less advertised means of governing the nation. Four reasons are suggested for Stalin's new maneuver. They are:

1. The accusation, especially abroad, that Stalin was belatedly aping the tactics of Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler.

2. Stalin's smoldering anger at the world and his own people for not wholly accepting the recent Zinoviev-Kamenev trial at its face value.

3. His realization that dead heroes like Lenin inherently command greater attention from the people than contemporary politicians and executives.

4. The explanation that Stalin, always modest, permitted the personal advertising only because he realized the people must have some "ikon" to replace the Czar and Church, but that he feels that day is now past, with innumerable other things, such as the five-year plans, the Stakhanovite movement, the Red Army and the new Constitution, to claim their attention.

Probably a grain of all these go into the reasons for the new maneuver, which significantly came just in advance of the eighth Congress of the Soviets on November 25 to promulgate the new constitution. Foreign rumors that Stalin is seriously ill, and that the move proves the open displeasure of his own party, are wholly discounted here. It is felt that he has lost no shred of his power, says the New York Herald Tribune. Stalin has never been bombastic, but there are many events and policies of contemporary Russians that leave him open to such a charge.

The sky writer who etched the word "Stalin" in letters a mile high for the edification of a million spectators watching an aviation meeting on the outskirts of Moscow suggested the trend of things only as recently as last August. No sky writer tried to print Lenin's name on the clouds. There were criticisms of this, as well as the stunt of the stratosphere balloon which took off carrying a giantic picture of Stalin, but not of Lenin.

If Stalin's new maneuver is serious, and many believe it is, there are many million photographs, paintings, sculptures and busts of him that will be a drug on the market.

Death Of Lincoln Told In Shorthand

dying. Tanner wrote:

"I finished my notes and passed into the back room where the President lay. It was very evident that he could not last long. There was no crowd in the room, which was very small, and I approached quite near the bed on which so much greatness lay—fast losing its hold on this world.

"The head of the bed was toward the door; at the head stood Captain Robert Lincoln, weeping on the shoulder of Senator Sumner. General Halleck stood just behind Robert Lincoln and I stood just to the left, between him and General Meiggs. Secretary Stanton was there, trying every way to be calm and yet he was very much moved.

"Utmost silence prevailed, broken only by the sound of strong men's sobs. It was a solemn time, I assure you.

"The President breathed heavily until a few minutes before he breathed his last, then his breath came easily and he passed off very quietly."

Dr. Randolph G. Adams, director of the Clements library, said that there was no doubt of the authenticity of the manuscript, written on a War Department letterhead. Dr. Adams said that Tanner acknowledged authorship of the letter before his death in 1927 but it remained in private hands.

Chen Cheng To See Taiyuan Warlord On Shansi Problem

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PEIPING, Jan. 7—General Chen Cheng Vice-Minister of War of the National Government, will proceed to Taiyuan, capital of Shansi Province, shortly to consult Marshal Yen Hsi-shan, Pacification Commissioner for Shansi and Suiyuan, on measures to wind up the aftermath of the recent military revolt in Sian, it was reliably learned here today.

Significance is attached to the forthcoming negotiations between the Nanking military leader and the Shansi warlord in that Marshal Yen is believed to have played an important role in the recent conclusion of a compromise between the rebel leaders and the Central Government.

The Nanking War Vice-Minister is expected to explain the measures announced by the Government yesterday to reorganize the administrative and military regimes in the Northwest. Pointing out the fact that restive sentiments are still apparent in the former Northeastern Army involved in the recent mutiny, informed quarters here express the belief that General Chen will seek an understanding with the Shansi warlord to effect an early stabilization of the northwestern situation.

It is understood that the Central troops recently mobilized in Shensi and Suiyuan will be concentrated around Sian to counteract any maneuvers to recreate disorders in the districts. Marshal Yen will be approached in this connection with the desirability of undertaking settlement of the recent Suiyuan hostilities between the Inner Mongolian troops and the provincial Chinese army.

Red Theories Taught In All Soviet Schools

In Addition Kremlin Sets Up Classes Of Over 1,730,000 To Study Practice

Russia's ruling Communist Party has organized into classes for the detailed study of Communist theory and practice more than 1,730,000 men and women, young and old. It has now been decided to increase these special classes to include millions of men and women outside the Party membership, says the Moscow correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor who writes as follows:—

The Party has appointed 96,533 "propaganda-carriers," or instructors, of whom 3722 are salaried workers devoting full time to this work. The others are unpaid, and do the work as a contribution to the Party. This year 112,955 study "circles" have been formed, devoting an hour or two a day to the history and principles of Communism.

Heard on All Sides

Of course the teaching of Communism is not limited to these groups. Communist theory and policy is taught to some extent in every elementary and higher school in the Soviet Union, and is included in every newspaper and magazine, in most radio programs and public addresses.

Every Soviet citizen, young or old, hears something of Communist theory almost every day of his life, and has no opportunity to hear an impartial exposition of any other political or economic theory.

But these special classes have hitherto been largely limited to members of Communist organizations; it is no proposed to extend them to "non-Party people." Of the students now enrolled, only 164,303 are outside Communist organizations. The students this winter included 869,590 party members, 319,862 candidates for membership, and 232,837 "sympathizers," a third party group organized two years ago, as well as 144,285 members of the Young Communist League.

The Party's decision to extend education in Communist theory to non-members was explained by A. Ugaroff, secretary of the Leningrad Party committee. He wrote: "It is our duty to educate the masses in sincere devotion to Communism and hostility to the class enemy. Every worker must become a conscious guide along the path of Communism."

Quoting Lenin's phrase that "Marxism is not a dogma but instructions for action," Mr. Ugaroff said that some Party leaders recently had lost "the fighting spirit necessary to conquer the enemies of socialism." They have wrongly concluded that the class struggle is not so sharp as it was, and an aggressive struggle for Party policy is no longer important. Such complacency, he said, would weaken the Party's position, enemies of socialism must not only be rooted out but, all workers must become conscious Communists.

Finger in Every Pie

Mr. Ugaroff made a significant explanation of how the Party maintains its power. He said: "The Party demands that a Communist must be at the center of every kind of work." In other words, a Communist must have the key position in every kind of enterprise in the Soviet Union.

The Soviet State owns or controls every means of productin and distribution, and the State in turn is absolutely controlled by the Communist Party, which exercises a monopoly over politics. The policy of "keeping a Communist at the center of every kind of work" naturally demands the education of an army of men and women in Communist theory and practice, brought up to date by the Kremlin's ideologists.

But Party leaders deplore the tendency to draw too sharp a line, between the education of Communists and of Soviet citizens outside the Party.

"Some Party leaders," wrote Mr. Ugaroff, "wrongly believe that they should limit their work to the Party, leaving non-Party affairs to the soviets, trade unions and other social organizations. Those Party organizations which neglect the education of non-party masses are failing to carry out their principal duty. Mass agitation for our political principles is of prime importance."

Italo-Japanese Talks On Ethiopia Progress

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

ROME, Jan. 5—Inaugurated following the withdrawal of Tokyo's legation at Addis Ababa, negotiations aimed at assuring Japan's trade interests in Ethiopia are still in progress here between the Italian Government and Japanese Embassy officials, it was authoritatively revealed today.

Informed quarters said that the negotiations are the normal consequence of Japan's withdrawal of diplomatic representation and that similar negotiations have either been completed already or are contemplated with other countris which have recognized Italy's East African Empire de jure or de facto.

Fritsch, Gold Stars In New German Film

Amphitryon, a German film distributed by Towa Shoji, opens at the Imperial Theater Thursday. The background for this picture is set in ancient Greece and the story is about the love of Jupiter for the beautiful Alkmene, playd by Kaethe Gold, the wife of Amphitryon, the Theban hero. The parts of Jupiter and Amphitryon are both played by Willie Fritsh.

Jupiter finds that it is hard to win the love of Alkmene in spite of his heavenly wisdom on account of her great love for her husband. The part of Juno, Jupiter's wife is played by Adele Sandrock. Amphitryon was directed by Runhold Schunel.

as sixty-six persons there. However, upward of seventy Americans throughout remained in their own residences. In the embassy Americans living there were provided with food and beds. Some men had to sleep on mattresses on the floor. Only newspaper men were allowed to leave the building. The embassy maintained an auto service to assist Americans in cases of emergency, but gasoline was extremely scarce and only urgent calls could be answered.

The same sort of foresight which prompted the Cabinet in its abrupt departure for Valencia has been exercised in other domains. Early provision was taken to be certain that the gold reserves of the Bank of Spain should not fall into the hands of the besiegers.

Long before Madrid was in danger, airplanes systematically transported gold into the safekeeping of foreign banks although to this day its whereabouts has not been definitely traced. Some say a large amount went to Barcelona and Soviet Russia while others say a considerable sum is deposited in the Bank of France's branch at Toulouse. There have been reports that some of the Spanish gold found a way into Britain.

There is not, however, so much mystery regarding the amount itself, which, according to the last Bank of Spain statement, was 2,000,000,000 pesetas.

Some time in the neighborhood of Nov. 20 the Financial Commissioner of the Defense Council issued an order that all national banks should transfer the funds and stock held in Madrid to branch offices in Eastern Spain. The banks were ordered to open their safe-deposit boxes and transfer in the same manner all money and stocks found there belonging to clients.

Foreign banks were invited to do likewise. They refused to comply and at least one prepared to close its offices and wind up its affairs if the invitation was renewed.

Without waiting for approval of the order the Finance Commissioner invaded the premises of one bank and started to carry it out. The order since has been published and now has legal force.

A precaution of like character was ordered early with regard to Spain's immense wealth in art. The El Grecos of Toledo were brought to Madrid before the city was stormed. Many art objects were removed from the capital when fear of a siege developed. Many paintings by Velasquez, Titian and Goya took the quarters vacated by the emigrant gold reserves and were transferred to safety in unoccupied vaults in the Bank of Spain.

Later the whole Prado Art Gallery was dismantled during the siege and a large number of paintings and treasures were shipped to eastern provinces.

Perhaps the most controversial and revolting features of the whole civil war and siege have been the continuous executions of prisoners, who have been guilty of no other crime than their affiliation with some political group or social caste, and the systematic campaign against the church and church education, promoted by the present authorities.

Executions Began Early

The executions began with the first day of the rebellion, following wholesale arrests, carried out just at night and then in daylight. Some personal instances will serve better than statistics of the dead to give an idea of these unbelievable events.

At first priests and nuns were arrested and I saw numerous bodies lying in streets and vacant lots on the outskirts of the city which, by unmistakable signs, I knew to be those of persons connected with religious orders. Frequently I visited the morgue and saw the bodies of those who had been executed there. There were 125 bodies on Sept. 26, 300 on Sept. 28 and for days the average seldom was under 100. I saw 200 bodies that last time I was allowed to enter, on Oct. 5. At that time the morgue officials expressed the opinion that I was exhibiting unhealthy curiosity and pointedly advised me not to return. Up to last week, it seems a conservative estimate that 25,000 persons have been executed in Madrid.

Naturally, such a wholesale tragedy makes less impression than individual tales, but such are often open to suspicion of exaggeration. But I am able to give some instances beyond denial. At first suspects were rounded up and shot without any preliminary examination but later the People's Court was established, before which they were placed on trial.

Four men were sentenced by this court and government authorities made much of the fact that they had been reprieved. Reports of the reprieve were published in all Madrid papers and communicated to the foreign press. Two days later these four men were rearrested and shot without trial.

I have personal knowledge, too, of the case of Admiral Javier de Salas, Minister of Marine in the Lerroux government. Admiral de Salas was arrested in his home and taken to the Model Prison with Martinez de Valasco, Melquiades Alvarez and other former Ministers.

When taken from his cell in the middle of the night he was asked by an armed militiaman why he had been arrested. Admiral de Salas answered that he was unable to account for his arrest except that he was a former Marine Minister and had been seized with several other former Ministers.

Without further questioning he was led into the prison courtyard and the militiaman was aiming a revolver at his head when militiamen on the roof fired machine guns at a group of other prisoners in the courtyard. The militiaman with Admiral de Salas fell to the ground, fearing to be a victim of the machine gun volley, but soon jumped to his feet and fled.

Admiral de Salas, who had also dropped to the ground, lay as dead throughout the night. The next morning he was able to regain his cell. Several weeks afterward he was again called from his cell and this time he suffered the ordeal he had at first escaped at the hands of the careless executioner.

Names Obtained in Raids

The names of many persons arrested were obtained through raids on party headquarters, where membership lists were obtained. Some of these victims were rescued through the intervention of South American embassies in a style recalling the adventures of the Scarlet Pimpernel.

These arrests and executions have not abated. They have continued even during the siege. On the night the government quit Madrid 1,600 male prisoners in the jails were delivered into the hands of the militia entrusted with conveying them out of the capital. The biggest exodus was from the model prison near University City, which later became the scene of actual fighting.

Some were transferred to near-by points, but the fate of those removed far afield has not been determined. The discovery of two large collective graves, coupled with other evidence, strengthens a presumption that the majority were murdered in two batches Nov. 7 and 8.

As to the anti-religious campaign, which has been so vigorously encouraged throughout the civil war, it suffices to say that the strongest impression one feels upon coming out of Spain is the distinction existing outside between Sunday and other days of the week. So far has the anti-religious movement gone that in Madrid Sunday is precisely like any other day.

Remaining Churches Fortresses

All churches that were not burned have been converted into fortresses. Barricades have been built about them and confessional boxes have been placed outside for use by militiamen as sentry boxes.

It was said in excuse for the burning of churches that the Fascists had been using them as fortresses, but their subsequent history shows the value of this excuse. There have been no masses since July, and there are probably not half a dozen priests in the city.

Here again a small personal incident tells more vividly than all these facts the extent to which attacks on religion have been carried. This correspondent, in speaking to a small child of the working classes, used what used to be a common form of taking leave in Spain, the word "adios."

The 3-year-old child rebuked this by saying, "We are at war—we don't say 'adios' any more; we say 'salute,'" and he raised his little fist clenched in the Communist manner.

Officially the government spokesmen deny any anti-religious policy. Premier Francisco Largo Caballero's newspaper Claridad says: "We consider it premature to put forth the religious question because nobody has prohibited freedom of worship." Nevertheless, the churches remain closed.

Man Said Able Now To Guide His 'Creation'

countries—make it unable to cope with this problem."

There is perhaps some hope, Dr. Riddle said, that a "few new and helpful genes (heredity units) may arise and be incorporated into the race within the next scores of thousands of year."

"If we were to express a wish," he said, "as to where man's next new genes would strike, no doubt many of us would wish and hope that the first new gene or two might further assist the work of the brain of man. For example, one gene to help straight thinking, and then perhaps another one which would so act on the mental traffic as sometimes to give the intellect the right of way over the swarming emotions."

Importance of Food

The "immediate and practical application of biology to each individual," it was pointed out at the symposium, "is the question of food." This angle was taken up by Dr. Sherman, who surveyed the individual and social aspects of this problem of human needs.

The developments of the twentieth century's research in nutrition, Dr. Sherman said, have for the first time given to science an adequate conception of nutritive requirements, showing the way to the prevention of the nutritional deficiency diseases.

One of the more recent discoveries, Dr. Sherman pointed out, is that there exists a very real difference between a merely adequate diet and an optimal diet. The former may stave off disease, whereas the latter has been found to result in the postponement of old age and the prolongation of the "period of the prime of life."

Dr. Meyer's share of the symposium dealt with the study of the "person" that has to live and put other speakers.

One of the human needs at present, Professor Meyer said, is a study of psychology that would take in human nature and behavior in all its ramifications, and its theoretical and practical demands and opportunities. Such a study, he said, should start from normal life and go to the less normal, "instead of building the study of man too exclusively upon pathology and hypotheses beginning with bankruptcies and the unconscious and the like."

"The goal," he added, "is a gain in knowledge as important to the average life as to that corner of human concern we call disease. The importance of sound, practical and actively creative work on and with man is the biggest concern in the crisis of humanity with the rapid changes of man's modern life."

Faith

There was once a man who wanted to hire an office boy. There was a long line of boys waiting at his door in response to a notice in the newspaper.

"Well, my lad," said the man to one who looked like a good prospect, "you've seen the long line of boys outside waiting for this job; is there any particular reason why you should have the job?"

"Yes, sir" replied the boy. "I'm the boy who brought his dinner."

He got the job—Whitewright (Texas) Sun.

Critics Are Like That

"I insured my voice," stated the famous singer, "for $100,000."

"And what," asked the critic, "have you done with the money?"

Strong Navy Declared Vital To US Policy

cussion:

By protecting their commerce and navigation a people protect their home territory. The United States Navy is intended to defend commerce and shipping and to give virility to the Monroe Doctrine. The lesson from the War of 1914 is that we should cultivate the will so to use this sea power to keep the country neutral and out of war; for the Navy is an element of a diplomatic defensive under control of the State Department. Thereby we would inoculate ourselves against the hysteria calling for war and the use of the Army.

Before the 1917 Break

Unneutrality, a failure to follow a sound American State Department precedent and lack of planning led us into war in 1917.

What is required as preparedness to enforce American neutrality is enough merchant marine to serve our Navy Departments; a will to affirm coastwise and overseas trade; a collaboration between the State and the accepted international law of neutral rights; and a will to use our sea forces, without a declaration of war, to prevent violations of our neutral rights of trade with other neutrals. This will assure to our population continuation of our neutral trade with other neutrals, security of our coastwise trade zones through the Panama Canal, security of trade with South America, normal high-seas insurance rates, protection of our home coasts; business as usual, neutrality; peace.

Revenue Bureau Reports The Group Had Aggregate Net Receipts Of $73,600,000

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Forty-one persons had million-dollar incomes in 1935, according to a preliminary report for that year issued by the Internal Revenue Bureau today. This compares with thirty-three who had such incomes the previous year.

The forty-one had an approximate average income of $1,800,000 each, on which they paid an average of $1,010,000 in taxes; for 1934 the figure was $1,750,000 average income and $976,000 average tax. The income of one exceeded $4,000,000.

Reflecting the general improvement of business, the net income reported in the million-dollar class was $73,630,000 in 1935, as compared with $57,775,000 in 1934. This group showed tax liability of $41,499,000 for 1935, as against $32,211,000 for 1934.

Individual returns for 1935 calendar-year incomes, filed to Aug. 31, 1936, numbered 4,473,426, of which 2,067,736 were taxable. The aggregate net income and tax liability were $14,656,079,421 and $654,116,061 respectively.

Returns Increase by 485,157

The number of returns increased by 485,157, or 12.2 per cent, as compared with the previous year. The net income increased $2,199,816,930, or 17.7 per cent, while the tax liability was $147,634,938, or 29.1 per cent greater. The per capita tax liability for all returns was $316.34. The average tax rate for all returns was 4.5 per cent.

The average net income for all returns was $3,276.25. For all returns the average the year before was $3,125.42.

Of the total number of returns filed 99.193 per cent were by individuals with incomes of less than $25,000 annually. This group reported 96.612 of the net income and paid 29.693 per cent of the tax. The millionaire group, which filed .001 per cent of the returns, reported .502 per cent of the income and paid 6.344 per cent of the tax.

The largest volume of income was shown as $8,714,063,000 by the class of less than $5,000 income, or 59.457 per cent of the total, and paid $44,763,000 in taxes, or 6.884 per cent of the total.

The $50,000-$100,000 class of taxpayers headed the tax payment with $110,557,000, or 16.902 per cent of the total. Both the $10,000-$25,000 and the $25,000-$50,000 classes paid more than $100,000,000 in taxes.

Income Sources Listed

Sources of income for 1935 were given as follows: Salaries, wages and commissions, $9,688,113,000; business profit, $1,836,522,000; partnership profit, $710,521,000; net capital gain $504,847,000; rents and royalties, $532,481,000; interest on government obligations not wholly exempt from taxes, $43,282,000; dividends on stocks of domestic corporations, $2,297,128,000; fiduciary, $319,846,000; interest other than tax exempt, $378,232,000; other income, $235,503,000; total income, $17,006,476,000.

Young Roosevelt Saved by New Drug

Doctor Used Prontylin In Fight On Streptococcus Throat Infection

Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr. faced death from a throat infection recently it was disclosed by his personal physician, Dr. George Loring Tobey Jr., at the Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital, where young Roosevelt was a patient.

The use of a new drug, prontylin, to combat the infection which followed a sinus condition, was also disclosed by Dr. Tobey.

Young Roosevelt's true condition at the Phillips House, where he has been confined since the day before Thanksgiving, probably never would have been revealed if Dr. Tobey had not considered himself called upon to refute reports from New York and Washington that he had "cured" the President's son of sinus trouble by an entirely new treatment.

Operation Held Unnecessary

When the youth's condition became extremely serious Dr. Tobey revealed he employed the new chemotherapeutic agent to ameliorate the streptococcus infection. The patient responded "beautifully," he said. The physician did not state at what time the crisis was past.

"We have only the sinus to worry about now," Dr. Tobey said. "We were using prontylin against the streptococcus, but that stage has passed.

"If he continues to improve as rapidly as at present, he should be able to join his family for Christmas. Unless there is some sharp and unexpected change, an operation will not be necessary to relieve his sinus infection."

Further evidence that all danger in the young man's condition had passed and that he was now on the road to recovery came when his financee, Miss Ethel du Pont, left his bedside for the first time in nearly three weeks and returned to her home in Delaware.

Medicine Used Abroad

The company manufacturing prontylin has been besieged in the past few days by sinus sufferers, as the result of publication of the supposed new "cure" and an official of the company came from its New York office and conferred for some time with Dr. Tobey in his offices.

Afterward the physician explained his use of prontylin in the Roosevelt case to newspaper men.

Prontylin has been used for treatment of streptococcus infection in this country for only about six months. In England and Germany doctors have used it with considerable success for about a year and a half.

Dr. Tobey used prontylin with marked success on several patients before he was called into the Roosevelt case. It is a medicine of complex formula, distributed by the druggists.

Prontylin is one of a group of drugs with which doctors are experimenting widely as blood purifiers in streptococcic infections. The best known of the group is prontosil.

According to Dr. Iago Galdston of the Academy of Medicine prontosil has been found effective in many instances as a blood purifier in streptococcic infections. It is administered either by injection or by mouth.

He had known of no instance where it had been used in the treatment of sinus trouble, he said, and unless the sinus condition were a streptococcic infection it was not known whether its use for that ailment would be effective.

Son Of Duce Planning Rome To S.F. Hop

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

ROME, Jan. 9—One of Premier Benito Mussolini's elder aviator sons, who won laurels in the Ethiopian campaign, is now planning a flight from Rome to San Francisco, it was reliably reported here this morning. He will fly the distance in stages, making four stops en route.

A big three-motored plane is reportedly being made ready at an airdrome near Rome, and it is understood that the flight will be carried out under the direction of Major Biseo, personal air pilot for the Duce.

Canadian Defense Estimates

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

OTTAWA, Jan. 9—The Dominion of Canada, reflecting the military situation throughout the world, is planning to increase its next fiscal defense estimates by at least $15,000,000, it is learned today. The 1937-38 budget will be announced shortly after Parliament convenes on next Thursday.

France Explains Reasons Failing To Pay War Debt

Tells Washington Due Not Only To International Conditions But To Depression

References to democracy and to disarmament—both apparently definite overtures to the American Government—were included in France's reply to the United States that it wouldn't be able to pay its war debt installments due on December 15 last, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Five other foreign governments also said they would be unable to pay, but none of them included in their notes to Washington these significant references to general world political circumstances. Only one remittance was expected from the whole list of 13 European debtors, and that was Finland, whose $231,315.50 follows its regular routine. This little Baltic republic, by making semi-annual payments when all the rest of the world defaulted, has built up a store of tangible credit in the United States which can hardly be overestimated.

Finland Reaps Benefits

Recently, big exhibitions of Finnish wares were held in large American department stores, with apparently satisfactory returns to Finnish manufacturers and exporters. Though the nation's production is relatively small, it has carved out a special place in the United States, and its returns for its war-debts payments down through the years are considered likely to be manifold.

The other debtors, including Great Britain and the major nations of Europe, owe today $154,862,658.24. Their payments previously due and unpaid total $1,159,958,451.15.

France is the only nation that has officially stated its desire to re-open the question. The statement, made by Foreign Minister Yvon Delbos to William C. Bullitt, American Ambassador to France, a fortnight ago served for the first time since 1933 to bring the war debts issue into the forefront. But such diplomatic talks as have been held behind the scenes have led to no results. No official discussions have been inaugurated.

France Needs a Friend

The French note gave strongest possible indications of a desire to get on warm terms once again with the United States. Plainly, the ebb and flow of European politics has made it important to France to seek all possible powerful friends, both for the sake of fresh borrowings—now banned under the Johnson Act—and for general political motives.

And in its refusal to make any payment on this due date, the French Government ascribes part of the reason to economic depression within its own country, rather than altogether blaming international transfer difficulties. Inability to collect the needed sums from the French taxpayer, rather than difficulties of transfer, are now more convincing to the American people in the light of records of vast transfers of sums from France and all other European countries which have been coming regularly during the period that the debts have been in default.

France Explains

The French note first takes cognizance of the American offer, made by R. Walton Moore, Acting Secretary of State, to reopen debt discussions at any time, and adds:

"Desirous of promising only what it will be able to perform, it regrets profoundly that the distressing economic depression which the country has just undergone and the state of world relations do not permit it as yet to present any proposals.

"Such proposals, in view of the disequilibrium of the balance of trade and the balance of payments, might have an influence of its effort toward recovery and might compromise the beneficial effects of the international monetary understandings in which it has been happy to participate recently.

"It hopes that these cooperative understandings, together with the improvement of world economic conditions, and also the triumph of the democratic thesis which it is endeavoring to sustain by the limitation or armaments, will permit it to open, through normal diplomatic channels, negotiations with a view to an arrangement acceptable to both countries which would strengthen their bonds of friendship and of confidence, to the benefit of the welfare and the peace of the peoples."

Holds Much Significance

This final paragraph is significant from several angles. It compresses into a single sentence:

1. A reference to the American-French-British monetary agreement, one of Washington's favorite ventures;

2. Mention of recovery—always an appealing note;

3. Stress on democracy—which President Roosevelt himself enunciated at Buenos Aires.

4. Reference to France's efforts to revive the disarmament effort, particularly calculated to appeal to President Roosevelt, who is said to be meditating a bold disarmament stroke;

5. Mention, finally, of "the peoples"—this Wilsonian and now Rooseveltian touch is very rare in European diplomatic correspondence, but American Presidents frequently draw a line of distinction between the "Governments" and the "peoples," and now the Leftist French Government follows suit.

An Anchor to Windward

From these references, it is plain that the war debt situation is being used somewhat as a diplomatic handle for France to get in touch with the United States once again. With storm clouds brewing in Europe, Paris is plainly anxious to throw out as many anchors as possible, and a more friendly understanding with Washington is an anchor second to none.

The French Government thus reverts to the policies of M. Edouard Herriot, who was always in favor of paying the war debt installments, and away from the more nationalist views of the cabinets which succeeded him.

The reference to disarmament follows calculatedly upon M. Delbos' mention of the subject in the Chambre des Deputies in a debate following President Roosevelt's Buenos Aires speech, which in turn was presaged by warm discussions of the subject at Geneva in the early autumn.

How Washington Sees It

France, therefore, viewed from Washington is banking on two lines of policy: actual rearmament to the extent of its resources, and disarmament diplomacy. In both lines, the United States could be of substantial assistance. With war debt default wiped out, new French loans could be floated in the United States, and if these were not used directly for re-armament they would be exactly as advantageous in freeing other capital in France or building up the nation's financial and economic strength.

As to disarmament diplomacy, the French leaders—advised by M. Andre Laboulaye, Ambassador to Washington and an old friend of the Roosevelt family—have obviously read the signs in the White House. They realize, as informed opinion here has seen for some weeks, that President Roosevelt is exploring the possibility of a new venture into European politics along the disarmament path.

12 Navy Bombers Will Fly To Hawaii, January 20

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9.—Twelve of the United States Navy's newest 15-ton patrol bombers, which were recently delivered at San Diego for service in Hawaii, are tentatively scheduled to make a 2,400-mile mass flight from San Diego to Honolulu on January 20, the Navy Bureau of Aeronautics announced here today.

The bombers are of the JBY-1 type and will be stationed at Pearl Harbor replacing the obsolete crafts there. The flight will probably be made under command of William M. McDad, commander of the sixth Pearl Harbor patrol squadron.

Hamilton Kept As Party Leader Of Republicans

National Committee Re-elects Him By A Vote Of 74 To 2 At Chicago

By a vote of 74 to 2 the American Republican National Committee declined at Chicago on December 17 last to accept the resignation of John D. M. Hamilton as its chairman, expressed confidence in his leadership and considered far-reaching steps to put the party abreast of economic and social advances, says the New York Times.

Meeting in a critical period in its history after two Presidential election defeats, the leaders appeared to appreciate the party situation. Although many were opposed to policies followed by the chairman, they decided to continue his leadership, believing that to make a change now would be "useless and ineffective."

In a frank four-hour discussion of the causes of the decline in party strength and the mistakes of the last campaign, the committee adopted a resolution pledging full faith in Mr. Hamilton after Representative Hamilton Fish and several others of the Borah faction had denounced him and demanded his displacement, says the Times article, which follows:

Landon Commends Spirit

After the committee had acted, a telegram from Governor Landon was read. This praised the committee, but was silent as to Mr. Hamilton. The telegram read:

"The splendid spirit which has been shown in defeat by those who supported the Republican ticket in the last general election should serve as an inspiration to members of the Republican National Committee in their deliberations.

"Republicans throughout the country will look to the committee and the party's elected representatives everywhere for intelligent leadership in formulating the plans for the future.

"Will you extend my personal regards to individual members of the committee? Cordially. Alf M. Landon."

Old-time leaders who had been ignored by Mr. Hamilton acquiesced in the committee's action. Their attitude was that under his direction a deficit of more than $900,000 had been created, and that the present officers should raise funds to wipe out this debt.

Charles D. Hilles, who did not attend yesterday's executive committee meeting, arrived early today and left after the noon recess, without participating in the proceedings.

For the first time in many years the skilled maneuvering of the New York committee was missing. Dan Pomeroy of New Jersey was absent, as was former Senator Phipps of Colorado.

New Policies Indicated

Today's discussion was without bitterness and rancor and produced a situation that many leaders believed would be the opening wedge for a reconstruction policy to assure cooperation in Congress and create a militant, fighting force for the by-elections in 1938.

The resolution, adopted after Mr. Fish and Mrs. Katherine K. Brown, committeewoman from Ohio, had failed in their compromises, was:

"Be it resolved, that this committee does hereby express its confidence in its chairman and that his tender of resignation is hereby refused."

Although Mr. Fish had declared that Mr. Hamilton was a reactionary and that the party would die under his leadership, he did not vote against the resolution of confidence. He explained that he held a proxy of the member from Alaska, but did not want to commit the member without his consent. The only two voting against Mr. Hamilton's continuance were Mrs. Brown and L. W. McCormick of Pennsylvania, who had the proxy of James W. Arnold of Georgia.

Idaho was not represented and neither was Mr. Hoover's State, California. But Joseph W. Tolbert, committeeman of South Carolina, and his daughter, Miss Julia E. Tolbert, national committeewoman, were seated on the front row along with Mrs. Hilles and Mrs. Ruth Baker Pratt.

Year-Round Program Is Urged

Mr. Hamilton faced his opposition, the Borah faction headed by Representative Fish. He stated his position as willing to retire unless he received a vote of confidence from the committee. He said the committee should be an active working organization 365 days a year.

"I consulted Governor Landon when I decided to call this meeting and proffer my resignation," he added. "He said my position was sound. If I am re-elected, I will feel free to go ahead and build up an organizatoin without implications of the last campaign, and would feel that I had the full cooperation of the committee from this date on.

"The chairman can be of invaluable assistance to members of Congress, but he must have the backing of the committee to make his work effective.

"I have no particular defense," he added. "We made a lot of mistakes, but I am not going into details."

Arthur M. Curtis of Missouri lauded the chairman's leadership, saying he had not done any worse than other committeemen save those of Vermont and Maine. He then offered his resolution, which was adopted.

This opened the debate, which ran for three hours, with Representative Fish directing his fire not only against Mr. Hamilton but the reactionary tendency of the party.

Knox Urges Popular Appeal

Colonel Frank C. Knox, who as the Vice Presidential candidate disagreed frequently with Governor Landon and the Republican high command, appeared at the afternoon session and insisted that the party must popularize its appeal.

Colonel Knox, who spoke for ten minutes in the executive session, said that the Republicans had lost because of the huge relief funds, the return of prosperity and the failure of the candidates to popularize the issues. His speech was applauded by those demanding new leaders and forward policies.

"My object is to try to unite the party," Mr. Fish said. "That is why I am here to oppose Hamilton's continuance as chairman. He is a reactionary and the party cannot be humanized or liberalized under him.

Social Security Issue Raised

"We must adopt forward policies so that wage-earners and liberals of the Middle West will return to us. If we cannot organize and liberalize we will die.

"If word goes out from this meeting that we have not learned a lesson, the party perishes before we can act even to liberalize it in Congress," he added, standing immediately in front of Mrs. Pratt of New York.

He said that Hamilton was a fine fellow, but was not the type to inspire confidence in the men who left the party in the last five years. 'He represents the old line discredited by the people, a disciple of Dave Mulvane, one of the most outstanding reactionaries."

He attacked Mr. Hamilton for opposing social security and said that this had driven millions of workers from the party. 'Wage-earners do as much thinking as the Republican Committee.' They know the issues and believe today that the Republican party is lined up with wealth and special privileges," he declared.

Mrs. Pratt interrupted to say that the speaker did not make the party's position clear on social security. She insisted that it did not oppose social security but only the unsound features of the present act.

"It is well to make that statement after election," Mr. Fish rejoined. "Wage-earners know better. We were practically a party to encouraging employers to send out vicious attacks on the act."

State Social Security Urged

Defending Mr. Hamilton against the social security strictures of Mr. Fish, G. Mason Owlett, national committeeman from Pennsylvania, said that the party was not against social security, but against the administration's program. He said that States should govern social security and not the Federal Government.

Walter S. Hallanan of West Virginia, Mrs. Robert Lincoln Hoyal of Arizona, Mrs. Mary G. Booze of Mississippi, F. F. Taggart of Ohio and Joseph D. Scanlon of Montana spoke briefly against Mr. Fish and the amendment offered to the Curtis resolution by Mrs. Brown to retain Mr. Hamilton as chairman without giving a vote of confidence.

Mrs. Brown finally withdrew her motion to amend the Curtis resolution so that Mr. Hamilton would be continued without approval of his record. She then lost her motion to lay the Curtis resolution on the table, and it was finally passed by a vote of 74 to 2. The committee then went into executive session to devise plans to rehabilitate the party and raise funds.

One of the toughest problems Mr. Hamilton faces, the committee members said, is the deficit of $901,501.61.

C. B. Goodspeed, the treasurer, reported that the party had spent $6,546,776 in the campaign. This included expenditures of $5,698,944 by the Republican National Committee and expenditures on account of the Senatorial Committee, Congressional Committee and advances to States amounting to $856,832.

Four years ago the Republican campaign expenditures were $2,676,000. In 1928 the expenditures ran up to $9,433,604; in 1924 they stood at $3,063,952; in 1920 they were $6,022,678.

Mr. Goodspeed's statement said that the expenditures this year were $67,000 less than the budget Chairman Hamilton had estimated, but the contributions amounted to only $5,349,542, or $968,705 less than the finance committee estimated it could raise, hence the deficit.

Laurel And Hardy Play Dual Roles In Our Relations

New laurels and added renown for Laurel and Hardy in celebration of their tenth anniversary as the foremost comedy team on the screen! They've enacted dual roles for the first time in a full-length feature and the result is unquestionably their greatest laugh hit in their most elaborate production. Their inimitable whimsical pantomime and deft fantasy is superbly performed in the artistic background of "Our Relations," which begins at the Imperial Theater Thursday.

"Our Relations," based on "The Money Box," written by England's foremost short sea-story teller, W. W. Jacobs, serves as an ideal vehicle for the film comics. It is a Stan Laurel production.

All is serene and peaceful in the opening scene with Laurel and Hardy enjoying afternoon tea with their wives in their quiet and sedate seaport town—with but one exception. A letter from home advises that their twin brothers, Alf and Bert, who ran away to sea as boys, have been reported hanged for joining in a mutiny. Fear of incurring disfavor with their socially-inclined wives and loss of prestige in the community prompts suppressing any news of the twin brothers.

In the next scene Laurel and Hardy are characterized as their sailor twin brothers coming to anchor in the aforesaid sedate seaport town. They come ashore to deliver a fabulously valuable pearl ring for their captain. For eight hilariously funny and exciting reels the audience is treated to the most involved and humorous spectacle of mistaken identity, with gangsters in quest of the ring, adding thrills. Laurel and Hardy were never more entertaining than portrayed in the dual roles.

The setting for their current production is so much more elaborate and realistic than preceding feature comedies from Roach studios that favorable notice is merited. The original and palatial pirate ship cafe, the picturesque ancient wooden vessel, and the weather-beaten dock wharf are outstanding in artistic background value.

The innovation of having Harry Lachman, internationally established as a painter and creator of spectacles, direct Laurel and Hardy proved highly successful in producing something entirely out of the ordinary in feature comedy.

The supporting cast in "Our Relations" is excellent in characterization and performance. Alan Hale, as the waiter; Sidney Toler, the ship's captain; Daphne Polard and Betty Healy, the wives; James Finlayson, the engineer; Iris Adrian and Lona Andre, cafe girls; Ralf Harolde and Noel Madison, the gangsters, and Arthur Housman, the inebriated stroller, aid Laurel and Hardy in achieving their greatest screen triumph.

year, especially costuming, lighting and technical direction. Koreya Senda whose long experience with the experimental theaters of Europe has enabled him to direct this play successfully, does not make it a wearisome production. Instead, it is a lively drama translated almost perfectly into every day language which every member of the audience can understand and enjoy.

On the whole, the women players who portray the roles of Mistress Ford, Mistress Page, and Mistress Quickly show finer acting than the men except Messrs. Nagata and Hongo who play the part of Sir John Falstaff and the Host of the Garter Inn respectively.

Introduced here for the first time is a clever piece of stage mechanism which enables the stagehands to prepare 19 effective scenes in rapid succession. It is the double revolving stage, multiple combinations of which create different scenic effects without going through much trouble which seems almost inevitable in every Japanese theater.

The current production will continue until next Monday with matinees on Saturday and Sunday.

New Joe E. Brown Hit At Nichigeki

Joe E. Brown—king of the laughmakers—comes to the Nippon Gekijo Thursday in his newest Warner Bros. comedy hit, "Polo Joe."

Joe has been almost everything in the sport world—prize fighter, racer, circus clown, high jumper, bike rider, hoofer, acrobat—and now he comes as a synthetic polo player. Again he portrays the meek soul who tries to cover his fright at his own limitations by insisting that they don't exist. He finds it necessary to pretend great prowess at polo, though he has never been on a horse, and gets fits of sneezing whenever he gets near one.

As Joe Bolton, he returns to his home town and the welcoming arms of his rich and gushing Aunt Minnie—after years in China. With him comes his deadpan valet, Hayward. Aunt Minnie's mansion is in the midst of a swanky polo-playing colony—and Joe at once falls head over heels in love with pretty Mary Hilton, who thinks no man can be a hero unless he plays polo.

To get out of his difficulty Joe pretends that he is a wow at it—and so is forced to join the club. He is in terror at what lies ahead and his valet gets the brilliant idea of hiring a gang of bruisers to kidnap him before the game. His rival for Mary's hand overhears Joe's scheme, and informs Mary's father.

So he is compelled to play in the big game—and what happens is good for more laughs to the second than you have enjoyed for many a long day.

This is a guarantee.

The supporting cast includes Carol Hughes, Richard "Skeets" Gallagher, Joseph King, Gordon Elliott, Fay Holden, George E. Stone, Olive Tell, David Newell, Milton Kibbee, Frank Orth, John Kelly and Charles Foy. The screen play is by Peter Milne and Hugh Cummings. William McGann directed.

Don't fail to see Joe as the polo-pretender—and don't be selfish—bring all the family.

NEW STYLE CENTER!

As a direct result of the change to a radical government in France, Hollywood is to inherit the fashion dictatorship of the world once centered in Paris.

That is the opinion of Orry-Kelly, Hollywood style authority, and many other colleagues in the profession at other film plants. All have been watching the effect of France's new form of government on its fashion mastery with eager attention.

According to a statement by Orry-Kelly to Kay Francis, Calude Rains and Director Michael Curtiz on the set of "Stolen Holiday," costumes designed for this and other pictures at various studios, aimed to hit the 1937 mode in feminine apparel, will probably set next year's styles.

New York, according to Orry-Kelly and his fellow designers, is not yet prepared to take over the style reins dropped in Paris. Hollywood is prepared. And in pictures themselves, with their introducing its creations throughout the world.

Study of the effect of the radical government in France shows that it, like the Russian government of a few years ago, will not encourage its famous designers to international competition. Economic upheaval and change will render it unfit to carry on its world fashion dictatorship, and finally, its chief world markets, capitalistic countries, will hesitate to buy from and copy even what Paris will have to offer.

"In designing the 1937 styles for all forms of feminine apparel, to be displayed by Miss Francis and mannequins in "Stolen Holiday," I bore in mind a new responsibility," Orry-Kelly declared. "I felt they would represent Hollywood in the battle it is entering, and will win, to make motion pictures a fount of new fashions as they are now, for example, the fount of all new musical hits.

"Hence the gowns and so on shown, are practical and suited for use not only on the screen but, unlike some which have been shown in pictures in the past, for adoption by stylish women everywhere."

SCREEN TECHNIQUE

All this talk about screen technique is the bunk.

This is the emphatic opinion of Humphrey Bogart, ex-Broadway star and now featured in "Black Legion," which has just started production at the Warner Bros. studios.

"A player can either act or he can't," said Bogart, "whether he is on a stage or facing a camera. If there's any difference in technique involved, it's in the camera.

"On the stage nothing can save a bad performance. On the screen of course, a good director like Archie Mayo knows a thousand clever ways to do it. "For instance, two people have a long sustained scene on the stage. They save it from monotony and sustain interest by changes of pace, vocal light and shade, carefully calculated timing. If they fail the scene is flat. "On the screen the same general effects are created by camera movement, manipulation of light and timed cutting.

"That's where screen technique is to be found—in the use of the camera.

"The only acting technique is to know how to act, whether in front of a camera or in an auditorium."

US Explorer Gets Giant Panda, First Ever Taken Alive

Mrs. W. H. Harkness Captures Animal Never Seen In Captivity For N.Y. Zoo

SHANGHAI.—The capture of a Giant Panda (reported in The Times of November 28) brings with it an accumulation of record. It is one of the rarest animals in the world; it has never been seen in captivity; and this specimen, destined for the Bronx Zoo in New York, has been brought out of the wild mountain fastnesses of the Chinese-Tibetan border by a woman.

Nearly two years ago an American, Mr. W. H. Harkness, arrived in Shanghai with the intention of capturing a Giant Panda alive. While waiting for the many difficulties in getting the necessary permit from the Chinese authorities to be surmounted he became ill and died. His wife heard the news in New York and determined to use what money he had left her in organizing an expedition to carry out his project. She reached Shanghai late last summer. Those who knew conditions in the Panda country in North-Western Szechwan looked upon the scheme as fantastic, and some had grave misgivings for Mrs. Harkness' personal safety in that bandit-ridden and inhospitable region.

She made her plans with determination, and, accompanied by a young Chinese explorer named Quentin Young, the brother of Jack T. Young, who acted as interpreter on the Kermit and Theodore Roosevelt Expedition, which secured the first Giant Panda to be shot by any Westerner, went to Chengtu, from there travelling into the almost inaccessible Wassu country to the north-west. Phenomenal luck attended their hunting. They surprised a female Giant Panda, which ran off, leaving her newly born cub in a nest in a hollow tree. This was just what they wanted, for, although traps had been set for adult Pandas, it was realized that it would be almost impossible to bring one out alive from that rugged country, and also because of the problem of food. Giant Pandas eat nothing but bamboo, and once clear of China it would be almost impossible to maintain a supply of fresh bamboos to feed it. By getting a young one and bringing it up on the bottle it might be possible to inure it to a dietary other than bamboo when it grew up.

Feeding the Baby

The expedition immediately turned back towards civilization, and, reaching Chengtu in safety, Mrs. Harkness flew to Shanghai with the precious infant Panda, which has probably received more care than any human baby. It is doubtful if anybody but a woman could have done what Mrs. Harkness has done. No mere man could have brought the baby animal alive down to Shanghai. Its rarity, the perils of the country where it lives, the long distances, the personal risk and hardships, and Mrs. Harkness' complete lack of any previous experience turn the journey into an epic.

Mrs. Harkness and Mr. Young arrived in Chengtu from the wilds with only the clothes they stood in, everything else, underclothing, sweaters, fur coats, and even blankets, having been sacrificed to keep the baby dry during the hard days of rapid travel back to civilization, when it was impossible to wash out and dry cloths and wrappers. To get the baby to feed from a bottle Mr. Young wrapped himself up in a fur coat with the hair outside and pretended to be its mother. In addition he was invaluable for his way with animals and his extraordinary knowledge of natural history. Mrs. Harkness has named the baby Panda, which is a female, Su-lin, after Mrs. Jack Young, the only Chinese woman explorer, in recognition of the assistance afforded her by the members of the Young family.

A Fascinating Cub

When she and the Panda left Shanghai the baby was in excellent condition, having had expert medical attention since its arrival. The utmost care is being taken of its feeding and other needs. Mrs. Harkness never lets it out of her sight. It cries exactly like a human infant, and is one of the most fascinating little animals that could be imagined, more interesting and amusing even than its only cousin, the Little Panda, which inhabits the same country, but is found southwestward into Nepal, is much more common, and has many times been exhibited in the London Zoo.

The Giant Panda was first discovered in 1868 by the missionary and naturalist Abbe Armanda David. For 60 years no white man set eyes on a Giant Panda in its natural haunts, and only a few of the native hunters. It was known to science from dried skins and skulls brought out by missionaries and explorers, and very little was known of its habits. In 1928 the Roosevelt brothers, Kermit and Theodore, after weeks of privation, put up and shot a fine adult male Panda in a snowstorm, and three others have been shot since by white men.

The Pandas belong to a family, the Ailuridae, all their own. They seem to occupy a position in the natural scale half way between the bears and the racoons. They are remarkable in many things; among others, in having hair on the soles of their feet and very heavy skulls with large, powerful molar teeth. These teeth have developed from their ancestors, who although flesh-eaters took to an exclusive diet of bamboo, a most extraordinary phenomenon. The Giant Panda, when fully grown, is about the size of a small bear, has a much longer tail than the true bears have, and is white on the head and body, with black circles round the eyes, black ears, black legs, and a black band over the shoulders.

$100,000,000 Auto Market In Argentina

U.S. Cars Preferred There, Despite High Duties; Gasoline Consumption Up

BUENOS AIRES.—About $100,000,000 worth of motor cars must be imported by Argentina annually for the next few years to replace her seriously depleted stocks of motor vehicles and if President Roosevelt's hint of a reciprocal trade treaty with Argentina is consummated, this vast market will be available almost exclusively to American automobile manufacturers.

A recently completed survey made the surprising disclosure that motor vehicle registrations in Argentina are now less than half of those reported for 1930, and the majority of those in use are rapidly reaching the discard stage. Even more significant is the revelation that despite this heavy decrease in the number of vehicles in use, the annual consumption of gasoline in Argentina is now greater than it was six years ago.

100,000 Needed Annually

Based on reports just compiled by the Transport Institute, the Roads Board and private surveys, it is estimated that at least 100,000 passenger cars and trucks will be required annually in Argentina for replacement purposes.

In the last twenty years Argentina has shown an overwhelming preference for motor vehicles of United States manufacture, says the New York Herald Tribune. Of 11,000 units imported in 1917 more than 10,900 came from the United States. Of 52,200 units imported in 1927 more than 95 per cent were of American origin. In the peak year, 1929, that proportion was increased to 96.4 per cent. In 1935 the United States supplied 23,900, or 95.8 per cent of Argentina's total imports. The proportion this year has been practically the same.

Depletiton of Stocks Shown

A survey by the "Instituto de Estudios Economicas del Transporte" showns conclusively how seriously Argentina's motor vehicle stocks have been depleted. In 1930 Argentina possessed 454,000 motor cars and trucks—this being the peak year. The institute has calculated that the number of vehicles in the republic in 1934 to total 318,000. This number was reduced to 288,000 in 1935 and to 241,000 in 1936. Present estimates are that there will be only 190,000 motor vehicles in circulation in 1937. The following table, prepared by the institute, shows the rise and fall in automotive registrations in Argentina from 1910 to 1936:

Year	Automobiles	Trucks	Total
1910	4,590	900	4,700
1915	18,100	900	19,000
1920	49,000	2,000	51,000
1925	162,000	20,000	182,000
1930	358,000	96,000	454,000
1931	344,000	97,000	441,000
1932	318,000	92,000	410,000
1933	270,000	86,000	356,000
1934	234,000	84,000	318,000
1935	208,000	80,000	288,000
1936	173,000	68,000	241,000

In 1935, one quarter, or 73,400, of the total number of vehicles were registered in Buenos Aires proper, according to the survey. The Province of Buenos Aires accounted for 94,200 motor vehicles or approximately one-third of the total for the entire republic. The Province of Santa Fe was next with 42,730, Cordoba with 25,900, and Entre Rios with 13,460. Mendoza accounted for 9,790, while the remainder was fairly evenly divided among the other nineteen provinces and territories of the republic.

91,000 To Be Scrapped in '37

"In 1937 and 1938," says the Institute, "automobiles in number to those imported in 1929 and 1930, namely 91,000 and 49,000, respectively, will be scrapped. For 1936 to have maintained the figure of 1935 it would have been necessary to import 72,000 motor vehicles, whereas the total will only be about 25,000."

"In order that the motor car circulation of 240,000 may be maintained in 1937 it would be necessary to import in that year 91,000 units in order to take care of the number of motor vehicles which will in all probability be scrapped in that year. But since it is estimated that only 40,000 units will be imported in 1937 it is believed that automobile registrations in the year 1937 will not exceed 190,000."

"As regards 1938, only 49,000 units (the imports of 1930) will have to be scrapped. From then onward, the figures of the vehicles scrapped from year to year will decline sharply, because in 1931 only 17,900 were imported, and in 1932 only 7,200"

"In fine, it should be pointed out that the number of 190,000 automobiles which can be reckoned for 1937, and perhaps for 1938, represents considerably less than half of the 454,000 in circulation in 1930, the peak year; that is a figure equal to 42 per cent of that of 1930. And in like manner it can be expected that as from 1938 or 1939, a progressive increase will set it."

Gasoline Consumption Up

It is significant that notwithstanding the sharp decrease in the number of registered automobiles in Argentina, consumption of gasoline has risen sharply. In 1930 motor fuel consumption totaled 237,800,000 gallons and, although this fell to 216,850,000 in 1932, it rose to 251,000,000 in 1935 and in the current year is expected to exceed 265,000,000.

Both passenger cars and trucks in Argentina today are being pushed to the limit. The average daily distance has been doubled due to a $75,000,000 road-building program. In recent years about 4,000 miles of new hard-surfaced highways have come into use besides several thousand miles of secondary roads.

Despite urgent demand for replacement motor vehicles, their sale in Argentina faces serious difficulties, especially the heavy duties. Customs duties have almost trebled in the last six years.

Exemption or drastic lowering of customs duties on motor vehicles would not mean any substantial loss in revenues, it is pointed out. Revenue from this sources in 1933 yielded the government approximately 4,000,000 pesos. This revenue was increased to 10 millions in 1934 and to 15 millions in 1935. But studies have revealed that the elimination of the customs duty, thus permitting the entry of a vastly increased number of motor vehicles, would bring at least an equivalent fiscal revenue from other sources, notably gasoline, oil and tires.

US Adopt Neutrality Accord At Buenos Aires

said the time had arrived to make such important work a duty of citizenship, rewarding it at the same time with those rights that are necessary for fully carrying out the duties of citizenship.

Miss Doris Stevens, who from a sickbed here directed the long and difficult battle to get the conference to take some action on the question of women's rights, regards the resolution as a victory, as she interprets it as recommending the grant of the vote to the women of all the American countries.

The conference then passed four resolutions concerning the interchange among American countries of documents, books, newspapers, magazines and other publications and one urging all countries to establish a Pan American radio hour during which at regular intervals they would broadcast programs to all the other American nations.

Another resolution recommends that all governments support and encourage the organization of local branches of the Association of Writers and Artists, which was instituted at Havana.

Protection of Artists Urged

A step toward protecting the rights of authors, translators and musicians was taken by the adoption of a resolution urging the Pan American Union to expedite its work on the preparation of a definite treaty by which the American nations would agree to pass laws punishing the piracy of literature and music.

The conference passed another resolution expressing its interest in the Inter-American Congress of Journalists at Valparaiso, Chile, next month and urging the journalists of all American countries to attend if possible.

The last project on the agenda was in the form of an agreement suggesting to the newspapers of all the American countries that they publish more articles and contributions tending to make known in their respective countries the ideas of outstanding men of the other American countries and also the progress of the American countries.

Mrs. Elise F. Musser in the name of the United States delegation made a reservation regarding all the conventions and resolutions adopted at today's session which might in any way affect the freedom of the press, radio or literary and artistic production or freedom of speech. She addressed the president of the session as follows:

"The sixth committee [that on intellectual cooperation] has found it necessary in order to finish its work to pass a large number of resolutions and conventions in respect of which there was no opportunity for careful final examination of the text.

"Without taking a position on these, since the United States delegation is in principle in accord with most if not all of them, the delegation reserves its final statement of viewpoint and attitude for the final act of the conference.

Reason For The Action

"The delegation of the United States feels obliged to do this both because of the solemn force which the resolutions of this conference as well as treaties and conventions should have and, particularly because among other things its constitutional position does not permit it to join in any expression which would affect in any way the principle of freedom of the press, of radio and of literary and artistic production and of freedom of speech, which we regard as essential to the democratic process."

Tourists Expected By Only Woman On Midway Island

Dot In Pacific Provides Ideal Vacation Land; What There Is Of It

HONOLULU—Climaxing modernization of a once distant and desolate place, women passengers aboard giant trans-Pacific clippers are stopping at Midway Island.

With the coming of women to Midway, there has fallen from the capable shoulders of Mrs. George Perry the distinction of being the only woman resident of the world's most remote cable station.

With her husband, who is superintendent of the Commercial Pacific cable relay station on Midway, Mrs. Perry has resided on the island for the past two years.

Rediscovering the island as a trans-Pacific stepping stone 1138 miles from Honolulu, Pan American Airways has constructed a modern hotel approximately 500 yards from the little cottage which Mrs. Perry made into a comfortable home, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mail Four Times a Year

Scarcely more than a year ago the Perrys and 21 men of the cable station personnel depended on the cable ship Dickenson for their only contact with the outside world. The Dickenson, making the voyage from Honolulu in four and one half days, called four times each year, bringing mail, supplies and replacement personnel.

Today Pan American clippers, flying from Honolulu in nine hours, bring weekly mail, magazines and movies which are enjoyed jointly by the airways' employees and the cable station staff.

Mrs. Perry has been accustomed to occupy her time, in addition to routine household duties, by a daily swim, or perhaps a set of tennis or round of golf with her husband.

Golf balls must be painted red to distinguish them from the sparkling white sand of the course. Sometimes gooney birds fly down, scoop up the ball in their beak, and fly away.

In the Midway parlance, Mrs. Perry explains, this event is merely accounted for as a "birdie" and the game proceeds, with a new ball substituted for the one so unceremoniously taken away.

Many Birds

Bleached remnants of wrecked ships jutting from the sparkling sand have added fascination to Mrs. Perry's frequent strolls along Midway's five miles of shoreline.

These weathered reminders include remains of the Wandering Minstrel, lost off Midway in 1887, and the Mongolia, which grounded on the barrier reef in later years.

On these long shoreline hikes Mrs. Perry always encountered great numbers of her feathered friends which have abounded on the island since long before it was made a bird refuge by presidential proclamation in 1904.

Gooney, booby, frigate, bos'n, mutton birds, Arctic and Hawaiian tern, yellow canaries, Laysan finch, wild ducks, plover and gannets abound; frequently nesting so carelessly the hiker must use caution lest he stumble into nests containing hatching eggs or young.

Enter Tourists

Because she has come to regard the entire island as her home and personal domain, Mrs. Perry experiences some slight misgivings when she contemplates its invasion by tourists.

But, on the other hand, she wants its attractions and beauties to be known, and firmly believes that within a year Midway island will be known as a vacationland, the advantages of which are limited only by the unfortunate circumstance there is not more of it.

Nudism Favored By Nazi Guards

no one say that such a standpoint, as exemplified here by the old philosophers, does not fit modern men and women of the great cities. On the contrary, temporary nakedness helps modern residents of a great city to overcome the dualism of soul and body and therewith to reject the really unhealthy traditions of the Middle Ages; and it is a symbol of the victory of our race at the moment when the saving racial ideal was about to be destroyed."

Criticizes Former Nudism

The periodical explains that the real trouble with the former nudist movement was that it created "secret leagues" and was partially in the hands of the Communists and social democrats. National Socialist nudism, it declares, has nothing to do with piquant photographs, for the National Socialists of today know what they want and what is their ideal and purpose.

The article as a whole is a defense of a book recently published by Major Surens, former chief of the army's athletic training school and now the head of the physical culture department of the Reich agrarian estate. He has been charged with the introduction of physical culture to the peasantry to prevent their suffering from a wholly one-sided physical development.

Whether he has had any success to date in introducing nudism to the peasantry is not revealed. The former nudist societies were largely big city affairs. No previous attempt seems to have been made to induce the peasants to assemble naked for the practice of "naktkultur." Just how the German farmers are going to react to the nudist appeal remains to be seen.

The famous comic team, Entatsu and Achako, are cast as two newspaper reporters in the PCL picture Shinzo ga Tsuyoi which opens at the Nippon Gekijo Thursday. These reporters go to the Island of Women, to get a story. The pair disguised as girls, succeed in landing on the island which is forbidden to men. After a series of absurd adventures, Entatsu and Achako return to their home and their story about the Island of Women proves a big success.

The cast includes Masako Tsutsumi Sadako Sawamura and Mari Maki, all PCL stars.

Fifty-Fifty

"Now, Willie, you must not be selfish. You should let your brother have the sled half the time."

"Yes, mother," replied the lad, "I do. I have it going down the hill and he has it coming up."

Aha!

"Most girls like to listen to soft nothings."

"Yes, if they mean something."

The Winter Man

Mr. Watson, a resident of Melbourne, is a buyer by profession and as such he travels regularly between Australia and Europe. Since he had two winter seasons every year the seasons are exactly reversed in the two continents, Mr. Watson has for the last 15 years.

Guessing Game

Bride: "Oh, yes. It's great fun. You know my husband is an artist. Yesterday we had a guessing game. He painted a picture and I cooked something for dinner—and we both guessed what the things were intended for."—Cotton Ginners' Journal.

Dipper

A teacher who had at different times talked to her small children about the heavens, asked them one day, "Where is the Big Dipper?"

A little girl spoke up: "Do you mean the Double Dip? It's down on Elm Street. They give a whole lot of ice cream!"

Snappy

The chemist was explaining to the lady the progress of his experiments.

"My," she commented, "the manufacture of synthetic rubber is such a slow process, isn't it?"

"Well," he returned, "we have to make it slow to make it snappy."

Pocketed

The tourist had just finished looking over the historic castle.

"We've made a stupid mistake," he said to the butler. "I tipped his lordship instead of you."

"That's awkward," declared the butler. "I'll never get it now."

Buffer Countries United By Fear

was reported to the New York Times. It has had the immediate effect of strengthening the bonds between the three members of the Little Entente, all of whom would stand to lose by a revision of Hungary's frontiers.

In the north of Europe tiny Lithuania, isolated on her windy steppes, looks southward toward her Polish frontier, which has been closed for more than sixteen years, and westward toward her German border, now an armed line of demarcation. Kovno now believes that her best protection from Germany is closer relations with Warsaw.

Poland, a key nation of Europe, faces the possibility of war on two fronts. The Poles want to continue their work of reconstruction, to revive provinces that were ravaged by war from 1914 to 1920. War between the Reich and the Soviet would bring these constructive efforts in Poland to an abrupt end.

Once again the Poles are on guard. General Rydz-Smigly does not hesitate to throw the entire weight of his country's influence and military power into the balance against the division of Europe into two rival armed camps. Poland's stand at Danzig is a warning to the rulers of the Third Reich not to trespass on her territory.

Line of Neutral States

From Bucharest to Warsaw goes Rumania's Foreign Minister, Victor Antonescu, to confer with Rydz-smigly on common Polish-Rumanian policies to prevent a Nazi-Soviet war. From the Baltic across Europe through Lithuania, Poland and Rumania to the Black Sea a line of neutral States is thus forming in an effort to prevent the threatened collision of Berlin's and Moscow's armed legions.

By reason of Czechoslovakia's mutual assistance pact with the Soviet Union, President Benes is in a position to influence Moscow toward a conciliatory policy. And Premier Stoyadinovitch of Yugoslavia, whose country's friendship is now being sought by Italy, is able to suggest caution to the headstrong dictator in Rome.

The World's Revolving Stage

might be better to put that excess weight into stouter landing gear and make it possible to land the heavy carriers on rough ground, after silent volplane down, and then get away light very easily. After all, are the Death Companies supposed to be trained merely to fall into enemy's hands or be shot down? For how are they ever to rejoin their base after they have done their work? What a waste of good material!

Japan can be perfectly calm about any inferiority in parachute-jumping and Death Companies. Not so much so about big bombers.

Brighter Lights For Main Highways

ing to millions prevented annually through adequate street and highway lighting.

Furthermore, it has been established that the death rate per accident on dark highways is nearly 60 per cent greater than the day-time toll and that most rural pedestrian fatalities occur at night.

All of which goes to show that, as compared with daylight travel, it is much more dangerous to drive or to walk at night on a poorly lighted road. It is also more difficult and fatiguing to drive at night on such a highway because visibility is low and the increased headlight power required often causes glare-blindness and eye strain.

Headlight Glare Tests

Engineers seem agreed that there is little improvement to be expected in lighting the path of travel by automobile headlamps. The introduction of "passing beams" that light up the right edge of the road when a car approaches has probably reduced the danger of night driving. Extension of the rule to walk on the left-hand side of the road, facing traffic, wearing white or light-colored clothing, and the building of sidewalks or footpaths along rural highways may also be counted on to help.

"Polarized" headlight beams have been proposed as a solution to the glare problem, but the fact that they would require special headlight lenses and windshields, besides legislation in all States, makes their use impracticable at present.

Both the sodium-vapor and the high-visibility incandescent lamps have been set up on a heavily travelled stretch of State Route No. 5 between Akron and Cuyahoga Falls in Northern Ohio. A road near Belmont, Mass., has been lighted with mercury-vapor lamps.

A well-designed system of highway lighting gives visibility distances, without undue glare, of from 700 to 1,200 feet, engineers say. This is for 10,000-lumen (1,000-candle-power) sodium-vapor lamps or equivalent mercury-vapor or incandescent lamps mounted at a height of twenty-five feet and spaced respectively 250 and 125 feet apart.

Average night speeds up to fifty miles an hour are common today, yet it is estimated that with headlights under ordinary traffic conditions showing clearly for only 125 feet, the top speed should not be above forty miles an hour, for it takes a minimum of 175 feet to stop from that speed.

Figures for the Saw Mill River and Hutchinson River Parkways in Westchester County—for years kept dark as a measure of economy—indicate that accidents after dark increased by 37 per cent after the lighting was cut off. On the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, between Washington and Mount Vernon, night accidents jumped two and one-half times when lighting was discontinued.

For Dangerous Roads

It is not proposed that every highway and street in the United States should be provided with a high degree of illumination. A large proportion of the latest roadlighting equipment has been set up at major intersections and along highway stretches of proved danger.

According to engineers of the General Electric Company, who in collaboration with highway experts of many States have made elaborate studies of the situation, about 50,000 miles of highway warrant the installation of modern lighting devices. This represents 15 per cent of the total of 350,000 miles of surfaced highways in the whole State system, and a fraction of the nation's highway system of 3,000,000 miles.

About 15 per cent of the State highway mileage is classified as having "heavy traffic"; that is, a density of over 1,500 vehicles per mile for every twenty-four hours.

The initial cost of installing safety lighting on 50,000 miles is estimated at from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000, or about 5 or 6 per cent of the original cost of the highways. The annual cost of keeping the lights in operation, exclusive of investment charges, adds from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000.

Jewels Hidden In 200 B.C. Mummy Revealed By XRay

Egyptian Mummy In New York Museum Holds Rich Gems

X-ray photographs of a mummy nearly 4,000 years old have revealed that the Metropolitan Museum of Art owns a hitherto unsuspected collection of Egyptian jewelry of 2,000 B.C.

In 1920 the museum's Egyptian expedition discovered the unplundered tomb of Wah under the portico of the tomb of Meket-Re at Thebes. Meket-Re was a high dignitary of the court at the end of the eleventh dynasty. From the size of Wah's tomb and from his coffin, the archaeologists thought him a rather humble person, perhaps a servitor of Meket-Re.

Since the mummy was intact and the bandages were neat and clean, the Egyptian department of the museum did not disturb the wrappings, thinking that nothing of value was to be found on the body. X-ray examination, however, has proved that the mummy was buried "with an extraordinary wealth of jewelry," the department now reports.

Experts Suggested Study

Early this year David Rosen, known for his restoration of works of art and for experiments with the X-ray and other invisible rays used in the study of antiquities, and Arthur Kopp, the Metropolitan's chemist, suggested to Herbert E. Winlock, the museum's director and curator of the Egyptian department, that X-ray photographs be taken of some mummies.

The first two mummies subjected to X-ray photographs did not show anything extraordinary. Then the mummy of Wah was brought into the improvised studio.

"The first photograph showed that we should have been rewarded far more than we could have expected had we removed those bandages," according to Mr. Winlock. "His neck, his chest, and his wrists were loaded with jewelry fashionable in Thebes about 2,000 BC."

Special plate holders then were devised which would make possible full-length photographs at a single exposure, first from the back and then from the front. These disclosed, besides the jewelry, that Wah was a young man of the normal Theban type, whose feet had at some time suffered injuries.

Mice Skeletons a Novelty

Discovery of skeletons of two mice caused surprise, since there was no opening through the bandages to indicate that anything could have entered them after Wah was buried. The mice skeletons were about three inches inside the outer layers of linen, but outside the bandages with which each leg was wrapped separately.

The surmise is that the embalmers left the body half bandaged, and that later when they returned to their task, the two mice had scuttled for the nearest hiding place and burrowed into the linen, where they were imprisoned as the outer wrappings were wound.

White Finked

Foreman—"How is it White hasn't turned up this morning?"

Navvy—"He met with an accident at his wedding yesterday. When he came out of the church he had an arch of crossed picks to walk under. Just then the hazzer went and his mates downed tools from force of habit."

On Disapproval

Nurse: "What do you think of the new baby sister the doctor left for you?"

Betty: "I don't blame the doctor for wanting to get rid of it, but why did he pick on us?"

The Connoisseur

"The prisoner," said the magistrate, "says that he had two glasses of 'double-brown.' What is this 'double-brown,' sergeant?"

"Not wot it was, you worship!" sadly replied the sergeant.

Chit-Chat

Officer (to colored driver who has been whipping his horse): "Don't whip him, man—talk to him."

Driver (to horse by way of opening conversation): "Ah comes from N'Awleans. Wheah does you-all come from?"—Southern Lumberman.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Haven of Refuge

Small boy (on arrival at country cottage): "Mummy, where is the bathtub?"

Mother: "There isn't any bathtub, dear."

Small Boy: "Good! This is going to be a real holiday."—Edinburgh Dispatch.

Carrying Out Instructions

The Mayor pressed a button on his desk, and the office boy entered.

"Here," said His Honor, "are a number of directions telling us how to run our city. See that every one is carried out."

And the office boy, gathering them all in a big waste basket, did so.

Check Up

He (twice nicked by razor): "Hey, barber, give me a glass of water."

Barber: "What's wrong, did I get a hair in jour mouth?"

He: "No, I just wanted to see if my neck leaks."—Annapolis Log.

PRINCES AND PRINCESSES ENJOY DUCK HUNTING

All the Princes and Princesses now in Tokyo including T.I.H. Prince and Princess Chichibu are reported to have enjoyed duck hunting at the Hama Detached Palace, arriving there before and after 10 a.m., Sunday. They were also accompanied by their sons and daughters.

T.I.H. Princess Teru and Princess Taka, it is further reported, enjoyed the game there, leaving the Imperial Palace at 11 a.m.

At noon, Their Highnesses had a luncheon all together, following which Princess Teru and Princess Taka left for the Palace at 2 p.m. and later other Princes and Princesses for their own palaces.

DIED WEDNESDAY

Mr. Johannes Morks, Kobe Business man, died Wednesday. The funeral service was held Friday and the burial took place in the Kasugano Cemetery. Mr. Morks was 42 years old.

ENTERTAINS AT DINNER

The Dominican Consul-General and Mrs. Germain Soriano entertained at a dinner Saturday at the Hotel New Grand in honor of the Bolivian Consul-General and Mrs. Juan Salinas de Lozada, who will leave Japan shortly. The other guests were the Panaman Consul and Mrs. Julio E. Briceno, the Venezuelan Consul-General and Mrs. Carlos Rodrigas Jimenz and the Dominican Counsellor Mr. Ramon Prieto.

THE 3RD ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF DR. CHIYOMATSU ISHIKAWA

A memorial party for the late Dr. Chiyomatsu Ishikawa, noted zoologist and former professor at the Imperial University of Tokyo was given at the Tokyo Kaikwan Hall, at 5 p.m. Sunday on the occasion of the 3rd anniversary of his death. Mr. Kinichi Ishisawa, heir of the scholar and members of his family were present. The anthology of the works by the scholar which consists of ten volumes was completed recently.

Mr. Masami Kuni, Korean dancer will leave for Germany at 10 p.m. today. He will appear on the stage of the Scala Theater in Vienna and stay in Germany for about two years to study the ballet dance.

TO HOLD FAREWELL MEETING

Miss Midori Torii, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Ryuzo Torii, noted archeologist who has been invited by the Museum of Fine Arts of Boston was entertained by her friends at a farewell party held Saturday. The party was given at the Mikawaya Restaurant, Yotsuya, by the members of the Musashino Society. Miss Torii will sail for San Francisco on board the Kokusai Kisen liner, Kongo Maru from Yokohama on January 23.

CONCERT BY GERMAN AND JAPANESE BRASS BANDS

A concert of brass bands will be held by the Brass Band of the Emeden, German Training ship, which arrived at Yokohama on Monday and the Imperial Naval Brass Band at the Hibiya Public Hall, at 2 p.m. Tuesday.

Mr. Torataro Ushizuka, Mayor of Tokyo will give a welcome address and the program will be performed by both brass bands. The concert is to be given under the auspices of the Tokyo Municipal Office, the Germano-Japanese Cultural Society, the Nichi-Doku Kyokai and with the collaboration of the Navy Department. Tickets will be issued free to the public at the office of the Hibiya Park at 10 a.m. Tuesday.

ENTERTAIN AT LUNCHEON

The French Ambassador and Mrs. Kammerer entertained at an informal luncheon Saturday in honor of Prince Ghika. The other guests were Viscount Kikujiro Ishii; the Brazilian Ambassador and Mrs. Velloso, the Rumanian Minister, Mr. Georges C. Stoicesco; the Apostolic Delegate, Monsignor H. E. Morella; Colonel de Lapomarede, the American Secretary and Mrs. Cabot Coville and Miss Madeline Kammerer.

PIRATE PARTY TO BE HELD

The entertainment committee of the American Club has announced that a Pirate Party will be held Saturday, February 13. The party will be fancy dress.

WEEK-END IN HAYAMA

Mr. and Mrs. G. N. Coe spent the weekend at their cottage in Hayama.

HOST AT DINNER

Lieutenant Alva Lasswell was host at dinner Friday. His guests included Mr. and Mrs. Frank Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Generald Warner, Mrs. Carol Holbrook, Miss Elsie Hunter, Lieutenant Gill Richardson and Lieutenant Roger Beadle.

TO RETURN TO JAPAN

Mr. Hans Umbhau, manager of H. Ahrens and Company at Yokohama, the agents for the Norddeutcher Lloyd Steamship Company, returns today on the Potsdam after a business trip to China.

DIRECTOR OF MILITARY AIR SERVICE ARRIVES IN FORMOSA

Lieutenant-General Motoo Furusho, Director of the Military Air Service, Headquarters, arrived in Taihoku Formosa by air at 4 p.m. Saturday, to conduct a series of inspections. He is scheduled to leave there for Japan proper on January 25 aboard the liner Horai Maru.

ENTERTAIN AT DINNER

The Norwegian Minister and Mrs. Finn Koren entertained at dinner Friday when their guests were the Minister of the Imperial Court and Mrs. T. Matsudaira, the Minister of the Netherlands, General J. C. Pabst; the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs and Mrs. K. Horinouchi; the Iran Minister and Mrs. Azimi; the Grand Master of Ceremonies of the Imperial Court and Viscountess Matsudaira; the Director of the Bureau of European and Asiatic Affairs and Mrs. S. Togo; Commander Yamagata, Master of Ceremonies of the Imperial Court; Mr. Arturo Alvarez Montenegro, the Argentine Charge d'Affaires; the Swedish Charge d'Affaires and Mrs. T. H. Wistrand; the Chief of the Protocol and Mrs. Hidaka; Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Crocker and Mr. Leif Buch.

NISEI GIRL MARRIES

The marriage of Miss Lily Mizuguchi to Mr. Nobuo Fujikake took place this afternoon at the Union Church, Aoyama. Miss Mizuguchi came to Japan from Colorado a few years ago and until recently was connected with the Tokyo Y.W.C.A.

Mr. Fujikake is at present connected with the Showa Soap company.

HOSTS AT DINNER

Mr. and Mrs. Ray G. Marshall entertained at a dinner Sunday. Their guests were Mr. J. Mills, Mr. Frank Hedges, Mr. and Mrs. Kieterling, Mr. and Mrs. Jan Fabius and Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Thompson.

FRESHMAN PARTY

The Freshman Class of the American School gave its annual party at the School Saturday. The room was decorated with college banners and a collegiate theme was chosen for the evening. The chairman of the entertainment committee was Miss Jean Jorgensen. The freshman class officers this year are Maurice Horn, president; Kenneth Lamont, vice-president; Margaret Covell, secretary and Florence Mayer, treasurer.

Alien Billions Of Cash In US Called Unwise

United States amounted to $1,460,000,000, an increase of nearly $1,000,000,000 since the end of 1933.

French, Dutch, and Swiss holdings total $390,000,000 the bulk of which has come since 1933. British balances increased by $230,000,000, or nearly a quarter of the total increase in foreign liabilities, with total British holding on short-term at $294,000,000.

Steady Since April, 1935

The movement of foreign long-term capital has been proceeding at a steady rate since April, 1935. From that date to the end of September, 1936, foreigners put $640,000,000 on balance into American securities, most of the orders coming from England and the gold-bloc countries, the Federal Reserve report states.

Combined with subsequent acquisitions and rising security prices, the investments of foreigners in the United States in the last 21 months are now estimated to have a market value of $1,000,000,000.

The great part of total foreign holdings, however, were acquired before the depression, and some of them before the war. Dutch and British investments in railroad bonds and insurance subsidiaries were of the latter type. While some foreigners withdrew investments here during the early years of the depression, low security prices attracted back as many as went out.

U. S. Balances Abroad Decline

Meantime, American balances abroad were declining. The drop since 1933 amounts to $625,000,000. An amount over $250,000,000 represents gradual liquidation of frozen claims on European and Latin-American countries. The inward movement of American funds, the reserve officials feel, has accentuated the effects of the great foreign investment flow.

In net effect, foreigners now have the same sort of lever over American markets—an perhaps governmental policy—which they possessed in 1914. For this reason President Roosevelt, Henry Morgenthau Jr., Secretary of Treasury, and S. Marriner Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, have been studying and seeking to arouse public opinion to the problem of foreign investment here.

Several Effects Possible

There are several possible effects. The least likely is that if affairs abroad should stabilize, this tide would seek to return to its foreign holders, thus causing a run on the American market, a decline of values, and a possible panic.

Should a European war break out, the first effect—as in 1914—would presumably be to depress the American stock market both immediately and psychologically, and through the forced liquidation of many of these funds. The consequences might rock the American internal economy, at least temporarily, and bring about pressure for various types of governmental activity.

Next, however, as in 1914 the remainder of these big holdings in the United States might be turned to the purchase of American munitions, raw materials, and manufactures of all sorts. The effect then would be to produce a boom in the United States. This boom—following upon the immediate slump—would if the 1914 precedent is a safe guide, produce a demand for continuing sales to Europe. And that, in the view of many authorities, is the path to American involvement.

M.I.T. Builds The Strongest Electro-Magnet

Opens The Way To Explore Atom's Structure And Study 'Absolute Zero'

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 19.—The construction of a magnet producing the strongest sustained magnetic held ever created by man was announced tonight at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The development opens the way to new studies in the structure of the atom and in the inconceivably cold and mysterious world of matter near "absolute zero,"—the point beyond which science knows nothing colder.

The powerful but small instrument, built by Dr. Francis Bitter, of the Department of Mining and Metallurgy, has produced a magnetic field 150,000 times stronger than that of the earth. In design it is essentially an electro-magnet, a copper coil eight inches long and six inches in diameter, says the New York Herald Tribune. Into this coil pours enough electricity to supply the needs of a town of 5,000 population—3,000 to 12,000 amperes of direct current at a pressure of 250 volts. The current produces a magnetic field in the hollow core of the coil.

Water Cools Great Heat

Because no ordinary wires could carry this electrical load, two copper bars, each six inches wide and one and one-half inches thick, are used to feed the magnet. Water flowing through a three-inch pipe carries away the tremendous heat generated. Without this cooling system, the magnet would melt in a flash.

Science has long known that magnetic forces distort and change matter. The chemical element bismuth, for example, when subjected to a magnetic field, loses much of its ability to conduct electricity. One of the most important uses of the new apparatus will be to determine what effect tremendous magnetic fields have on gases, liquids, solids, alloys, and even plant and animal tissue.

The magnet is expected to throw new light on the structure of the atom by aiding accurate measurement of the Zeeman effect—the splitting up of the lines in a color spectroscope. The apparatus may also be used for studying very fast moving particles.

Embarking on one of the first experiments with the apparatus in the spring, Dr. Bitter and Dr. Frederick G. Keyes, head of the M. I. T. department of chemistry, will seek to explore the little-known world near absolute zero—459.69 degrees below zero, Fahrenheit.

Rare Arms Shown At Metropolitan

Museum Opens First Of Four Displays Of Big Collection Left To It By G. C. Stone

The Metropolitan Museum of Art will place on exhibition recently for the first time selections from the bequest of arms and armor made by George C. Stone, internationally known metallurgist, inventor and collector.

So large is the collection, totaling some 4,000 pieces, that four exhibitions have been planned to give the public an opportunity to see the valuable and varied objects assembled by Mr. Stone over half a century.

The present exhibition comprises selections from Japanese material, comprising about 800 items, says the New York Times. This is the outstanding acquisition in the eastern field in the history of the museum's department of arms and armor, according to Stephen V. Grancsay, curator. Later exhibitions will comprise Turkish and Balkan, Chinese and Malayan, and Indian and Persian objects.

Work of Myochin Masters

The principal sections of the Japanese exhibit are armor, swords and firearms and archery equipment. Among the helmets of unusual merit are some signed by the Myochin masters. This family of armorers occupies an exceptional place in the history of Japanese art. Its members succeeded one another as court armorers without interruption for 700 years, from the twelfth to the end of the eighteenth century.

The swords include 136 specimens, embracing examples of the three main types, the "tachi" or slung sword, and the "katana" and "wakizashi," the long and short sword, respectively. The tallest bow exhibited measures seven feet. Also shown is a valuable group of arrowheads, varied in form and many elaborately pierced and chased.

The museum will also display important medals purchased from the Henry Oppenheimer collection. This group of medals, one of the great private collections of medallic art, was sold at auction in London last July. The Metropolitan took advantage of the opportunity to buy a valuable and representative group.

Famous Pisanello Medal Shown

Outstanding in the group is the medal struck to honor Alfonso V of Naples, a work by an artisan regarded by many as the first and greatest of all medalists, Antonio Risanello (1395-1455). The collection also includes examples, mostly in bronze, by such outstanding Italian and French artists as Pasti, Sperandio, the Leonis, Cauvain and Dupre.

The museum has received as a gift from Mary Ann Blumenthal (Mrs. George Blumenthal) a collection of more than seventy examples of rare lace, comprising drawn-work, cutwork, needlepoint and bobbin techniques and extending in period from the sixteenth to the early nineteenth century. Conspicuous in the collection are splendid lengths of Italian needlepoint.

"Ranking high in the collection are the greatest Venetian needle-point laces of the seveteenth century, generally considered the supreme achievement of the Italian workers' art," according to Frances Little, assistant curator in charge of the museum's textile study room.

High Wage Rate Held Barrier To Re-employment

Demand Of Labor, Relief Pressure Seen Deterrents To Expansion Of Jobs

With total dividend payments far higher than ever before, with electric power production breaking all records, and with most indices of general business above normal, it becomes increasingly difficult to picture the nation as still suffering from depression. The fact remains, however, that both in construction and railroading the volume of employment appears to be well below that of 1929, and, in most other fields it has not risen sufficiently to keep pace with the growth of population. Since it is employment which is commonly looked upon as the true gauge of prosperity, it is important to explain this anomalous state of affairs.

Labor Not Permanently Displaced

To the overproductionists, the explanation appears simple indeed. They assure us that improved machinery and technique have permanently displaced labor, and that never again can we look for a volume of employment approaching that of 1929. This explanation seems satisfactory until the question is raised as to how it happens that so many persons were working in 1929.

New inventions had been steadily turning workers out of jobs for more than 200 years. Were the logic of the overproductionists correct, it would seem that, by 1929, instead of having some 95 per cent of the able-bodied men of the United States busy, not more than one in four should actually have been at work, says the N. Y. Herald Tribune. They need to explain why investions, hough failing to prove injurious to industry before 1929, have become so malevolent since that date

Desire for Goods Unlimited

While the doctrine of overproduction and technological unemployment has appealed to labor leaders and popular writers on economic subjects, it has never found any considerable favor with those versed in economic science. Economists almost universally hold that the desire for goods is unlimited and that there is always a demand for more labor than can be supplied, provided the price is low enough. It is this question of the price of labor, in other words, the wage rate, which the layman is prone to overlook.

The labor market is similar to the market for wheat or corn. If the the market for wheat or corn. If the price is set low enough it is always possible to market the entire crop. At a higher price only part of the crop can be sold.

Basic Law Overlooked

When legislators enact minimum wage laws they are put in the virtual position of closing their eyes to the existence of the inexorable law of supply and demand. They are calling upon industry to hire the entire labor supply at a price higher than that which will clear the market. In most cases they seem to be blissfully ignorant of the fact that all they are accomplishing is to make certain that we shall have a large volume of unemployment and hence a strong demand for relief.

Recently the leaders of the American Federation of Labor have reiterated their demands that weekly hours of labor be shortened and that hourly rates of pay be raised. If the government forces industry to accede to such demands, the inevitable result will be to perpetuate and probably increase the volume of unemployment. The chief reason why recovery has occurred is that prices of manufactured products have risen until they have gradually overtaken the inflated wage rates which labor has maintained ever since the depression began Organized labor seems unable to learn the lesson that workers gain far more from full employment at moderate wage rates than from occasional employment at exorbitant wage rates.

Now the Administration is calling upon industrial leaders to redouble their efforts to absorb the entire labor supply, thus relieving the government of the burden of caring for the unemployed. Here again, the crux of the whole matter, namely the price of labor, is ignored.

Consideration of the question of how W. P. A. workers are to be transferred to private pay rolls also helps us to understand the anomalous situation now existing in which the number of employees in private industry is still well below normal, even through business is booming.

Even in times of extreme prosperity no one expects private industry to absorb all the teachers, postmen, policemen, firemen, soldiers, sailors, clerks and janitors whose names are commonly found on the public pay rolls. Why not? The answer is that, for the services of these men and women, government bids more than any private employer is willing to pay. Were it to do otherwise, its entire force of employes would gradually shrink away.

The fact which is now being persistently overlooked or ignored is that at present W. P. A. workers are in this respect in exactly the same position as other public employers. They are, for the most part, being hired at rates higher than any private employer can afford to pay. The weekly wage rates in the W. P. A. are commonly about the same as rates customarily paid for persons in like occupations in private industry. However, the government but rarely insists on standards as high as those set by private industry. Regular weekly hours are usually fewer than required in private establishments, and unpaid overtime, which is a common bugaboo for the typical private office workers, is almost unknown.

Even in the best managed W. P. A. projects tardiness, frequent absences on account of illness, inefficiency or inattention to work are likely to be treated with much more tolerance than is customary in private employment. In the more poorly managed W. P. A. projects the fact is notorious that little real work is required and that discipline is notable mainly for its absence.

These differences between conditions on W. P. A. projects and conditions in private industry are mainly explained by the following facts:

1. Many of the W. P. A. projects are primarily make-work affairs, and therefore no one cares particularly whether much or little is accomplished.

2. Inefficiency on the part of the worker does not spell for the man supervising the work, either loss of his job or dollars out of pocket.

The belief is at present widespread that, not only persons on relief, but also persons employed on W. P. A. projects consist mainly of those not employable in private industry. This point of view is, in the main, erroneous. There are, of course, many on the W. P. A. rolls who, because of age or illness, have lost their former earning ability. Still others always have been physically or mentally subnormal. The majority are, however, able bodied and mentally capable of earning a living.

Not a few W. P. A. workers are competent men and women who have been trained for types of work the demand for which has shrunk or largely disappeared, or perhaps has never been sufficient to absorb the supply of qualified workers. It seems probable, nevertheless, that the majority of those employed by the W. P. A. never have earned in private industry as high hourly real wages as they are being paid by the W. P. A. today. It is indeed doubtful that, in any private employment they have ever received hourly money wages as high as they are now getting.

The fact should be faced that government has taken upon itself the task of providing for the less efficient sections of its population more leisure, easier work, and higher standards of comfort than these groups have, in the past been able to provide for themselves. Previous experience as well as present manifestations, indicate that it is far easier to assume such a burden than to get rid of it.

Many such citizens heartily approve of present relief measures, but are, nevertheless, totally unwilling to "pay the piper" in a straightforward fashion. Since they object to paying direct taxes to cover the expense, the government raises the necessary funds by borrowing from the banks. This process inflates the currency, raises prices and thus surreptiously places the burden upon holders of bonds, mortgages, life insurance policies, savings accounts and bank deposits.

Experience shows that inflation is a dangerous way of financing governmental costs. All too often it gets out of hand and results in dire disaster. It seems clear, therefore, that if the more prosperous members of society desire to better the lot of the less fortunate groups by giving to the latter an easier life and more income they should proceed with open eyes and should stop berating private employers for not hiring employees at wage rates too high to be profitable. Furthermore, those employed in private industry should tax themselves sufficiently to cover the full expense of the program for bettering the lot of the less fortunate classes. Dodging the issue and depending upon inflation as a substitute for taxes is playing with fire.

The Unconscious Truth

The mathematics master noticed that one of his pupils was day-dreaming, and not following his work on the blackboard. To recall his attention he said sharply:

"Board, Jenkins, board!"

The boy, startled, looked up.

"Yes, sir, very!" came the reply.

Luckiest Actor!

Warren Hull claims that he is probably the luckiest actor in all show business.

"Even the bad breaks work out just right," says this singing actor whose fan mail chart shows a straight line going up and up. "For instance, take the time I sprained my ankle while making 'Fugitive In The Sky.'"

"Never heard of a sprained ankle being good news," muttered your correspondent.

"The point is—it happened at just the right time! In the story, I'm a newspaper reporter—and I have a big fight with one Killer Madsen, played by Howard Phillips. I'm seriously injured, and during a number of scenes I'm laid out and recuperating.

"Well, I sprained my ankle just as we finished shooting that fight. Result was, I could go right on working and still rest the foot. In fact, the real pain of it helped me act the injured role with considerably more realism.

"That's what a man ought to try to do with any misfortune—turn them to advantage."

Warren was born lucky. For he was born within a few miles of Niagara Falls—certainly a good omen for an actor destined to win fame through romantic appeal.

And he didn't have occupational puzzles very long. A vacation job—sweeping floors in a coal mine at fifty cents a day—convinced him that he didn't want to have much to do with plain hard work.

Selling vacuum cleaners convinced young Hull that he wasn't intended for either salesmanship or business.

"Then I decided that the one business for me was pictures," Hull relates. "But the only chances I could turn up were in radio. So I went into radio for four years. That's another sample of the way Fate gives me personal attention. For if I had gone into the highly-competitive movie business without first having had that radio training, I probably would have failed.

"As things turned out, that radio experience has been a big help in work before the camera. Especially in training me in the art of conveying a lot by tone of the voice. Any mood of a picture can be enhanced by the right voice modulations—from action to tragedy; almost as much so as in a radio production.

"Another sample—I came to pictures to sing. But instead I was placed in straight dramatic roles. The result is that when I finally get my chance to sing on the screen, I will have had screen-acting experience first. Which should mean that I'll have a better chance to get over as a singing actor."

Fact is, the goddess of luck overlooks no bets with Warren Hull. Warren's throat had needed examination and care for some time, and Warren hadn't taken time out to go to a doctor.

So—his featured role in 'Fugitive In The Sky' made it necessary for him to spend days in a studio-made dust storm. This aggravated the condition, which sent Warren to the doctor. And he's all right now.

Il Duce Spends $335,000,000 To Cultivate Land

500 Million Acres Swamps Made Profitable During Fascist Rule

ROME, Dec. 26.—In fourteen years of Fascism, Premier Benito Mussolini has spent more than $335,000,000 in putting 500,000,000 acres of swamp land into profitable cultivation, it was shown today. Mussolini's program is only partly completed. When it is finished he hopes to have almost 900,000,000 acres of new land under the plow.

Since the advent of Fascism in Italy 220,000,000 acres have been drained and settled in various regions, notably the malaria-ridden Pontine marshes south of Rome, which successive popes and kings unsuccessfully attempted to reclaim.

Reclamation work is being pushed on other projects totaling 293,000,000 acres. There still remain 300,000,000 acres of water-bogged land which Mussolini plans to drain and settle, after his current projects are completed.

One statistician has calculated that 135,000,000 working days, involving employment for many thousands of men, already have been spent on the reclamation projects. Sixty-four new villages have been built on reclaimed land.

The new land is being settled by war veterans and by peasants from overcrowded regions. Each settler receives a plot of land, a house and farming equipment and told to make the soil pay. Payment for permanent possession of the land and house is on an installment basis. The government provides schools, churches, recreation halls and sports fields. These settlers are among the most ardent supporters of Fascism.

Fascist writers proudly compare the achievements of the last fourteen years of Fascism with those of the pre-Fascist era. Until the advent of Mussolini only 186,000,000 acres had been classified for eventual reclamation. Work on only 70,000,000 acres had been completed. On another 70,000,000, it was in course of execution.

A large part of the work in reclaiming marshy land, engineers have found, is the construction of dams and drainage systems. Once the water is controlled, it is comparatively easy to drain the land and prepare it for cultivation.

'Superior Race' Theory Splits Soviet Experts

Report To Psychiatrists' Congress On Subject Is Suppressed By Officials

MOSCOW, Dec. 26.—A political-scientific controversy between proponents and opponents of the theory that some races are superior to others, a theory which orthodox Marxist doctrine rejects, attracted wide attention in Moscow today. It centered in the All-Union Congress of Psychiatrists and followed suppression of a report to the congress dealing with the theory.

It was charged that G. N. Kaminsky, Commissar of Public Health, had influenced Congress officials to destroy the report to prevent circulation of an attack on Professor Solomon G. Levit, who was recently expelled from the Communist party and denounced as a "false scientist" by the official press because he defended the doctrine of racial superiority.

Levit, head of the famous Medico-Genetic Institute, and well known in American scientific circles, recently caused a controversy in Soviet scientific circles by his acceptance of what orthodox Communists call the "Fascist theory of race superiority." He was attacked because his views on biological determination among races, the role of hereditary traits and biological explanations for crime were contrary to Marxist doctrine.

Professor M. B. Krol, in a contribution to the suppressed report, denounced Levit and called for a "merciless fight against soch false science." One thousand copies of the report were seized at the printer's and destroyed.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Forgotten Soldier

Private Frank De Costa was a member of the First Provisional Regiment of The New York Guard, mobilized by Special Order No. 198 of the Adjutant General's Office, State of New York, dated Albany, Aug. 6, 1917. The order was never officially recognized by either State or Federal Legislative action. De Costa died in a Field Hospital at Ossining and was buried at Bonticou Crag in the Rondout Valley, whence the body was transferred to its present location in the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, Scarborough, New York. The plot was donated by William Rockefeller and the cost of the funeral was defrayed by the regimental comrades of the deceased.

This briefly is the story of the Forgotten Soldier and his repudiated regiment.

hours' extra work in a penal company, and second, return to prison.

All prisoners assure inquirers that despite the hard work the prison camp with its "comradeship" and fresh air is still better than a bare, closed prison cell. For this reason and also because only prisoners with comparatively light sentences are sent to the camps, escapes are rare despite the nearness of the Netherland border.

Any attempts to escape are also discouraged by the deadly menace of the swamps, orders to guards to shoot to kill and the fact that fugitives are easily recognized in the next Netherland village by their blue denim overalls and are extradited as ordinary criminals.

Each prison camp contains about 1,000 prisoners and has its own kitchen, laundry, shower baths and hospital. Camp physicians assure one that the healthy if simple life keeps the sick list small.

The conscript labor service workers are divided into troops of 120 men each and each troop usually has its own camp. Life in the labor service camps is much the same as in any military camp except that the men handle the spades and pickaxes instead of guns

It is impossible to obtain exact figures on just how much of the gigantic project has been completed thus far, but the prison laborers, it was said, have dug 143 miles of ditches and canals, built thirty-four miles of roads and drained 1,500 acres, on which thirty peasant homesteads produced the first crop this year.

In order to speed the work, Colonel General Hermann Goering, as executer of the Four-Year Plan, has appointed Hans Kerrl Reich Church Minister and head of the Reich Office for Land Planning, as director of the whole reclamation project with instructions to expand and coordinate the two kinds of la- now engaged on it.

Going To War Soon May Cost U.S. Citizenship

Senators, Alarmed By Socialists' Recruiting For Spain, Talk Of Law

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26—Legislation to take away the citizenship of Americans volunteering to fight in foreign wars was being discussed today in influential Senate quarters.

The proposal was provoked by the move of the Socialist party of New York to enlist 500 volunteers to fight for the loyalist against the rebels in Spain's civil war.

Several Senators, including Key Pittman, Democrat, of Nevada, chairman of the Foreign Committee, have expressed concern over the Socialists' move, contending it is a violation of the spirit of the American neutrality policy.

The proposal to take away citizenship rights from the volunteers probably will be introduced as a separate bill, but if it is not enacted, its proponents will offer it as an amendment to the neutrality law, when legislation to extend that act comes before the Senate.

The Socialist party in New York also has undertaken to raise a $50,000 fund to aid the Spanish government's defense. Other organizations in America already have extended financial help to the loyalists.

The American neutrality law does not cover civil wars, but Administration experts are studying proposals to make it broad enough to do so.

Such a move might cover the extension of financial aid, because loans to belligerent nations are prohibited in the present law, but there is no reference to citizens volunteering to fight in a foreign conflict. Senators studying the problem contend that the volunteering of warriors is far more menacing to American neutrality than travelling on belligerent ships, which is prohibited by the law.

One of the proposals advanced in Senate quarters to meet the situation would apply retroactively, canceling the citizenship of all Americans fighting in Spain when the law was passed.

Bow And Arrow Vie With Guns In A Deer Hunt

against the gray sky as the hunters took the field. The shotgun men talked and clattered through the underbrush. Mr. Davis and Mr. Jacobs lost all semblance of insurance men and school teachers. Their motions took on a creeping aspect, and when they spoke, which was rarely, it was in hushed and expectant tones.

Hope to Show Up Gunmen

"You know it would be a great thing for hunting with the bow if we could kill a deer and those fellows with the shotguns didn't", whispered Mr. Davis as he stole along.

"If we were all just bow-and-arrow men we'd hunt differently," murmured Mr. Jacobs, fitting an arrow to string and pausing to test the fifty-six-pound pull of his bow.

The pair took stands behind large oak trees in fairly open pasture land. From these points of vantage they sniffed the wind, watched the sway of the leaves and cocked an ear for any interruption of the dry rustle the wind was making in the dead grass. From distant thickets could be heard the crashing and clatter of the shot-gun men on drive. One of them clanked two pieces of iron together and others whistled so as not to be shot for deer.

"The kind of bow-and-arrow hunting I really like is where you feel safe enough to go into the woods, which you don't here," said Mr. Jacobs behind his sheltering tree. At one point, as the drive drew nearer, four deer emerged from the swamp and scampered up the sloping meadow. Mr. Davis tensed. His eyes flashed. He drew his arrow to the head and waited, training it on the deer as they came abreast of him only sixty yards distant. They frisked past, but he did not loose the shaft. As they disappeared into a thicket he eased his bow and grinned ruefully.

"Every one of 'em a doe," he said and took his stand again. From behind his tree Mr. Jacobs saw a buck and a doe go by, but they were far beyond range.

Portable Stove Brews Tea

Upon returning for a rest, several in the party entered the farmhouse to get warm, but Mr. Jacobs unfolded a portable stove from the trunk on his car and brewed a cup of tea. Then, despite the freezing weather, he busied himself in fashioning an extra quiver out of an old inner tube. It was hanging from his belt when the others emerged.

"Look," he said, pointing to his new gadget. "I made it myself; just since I've been here."

During a subsequent drive the hunters came across a doe that some one had shot. Cecil E. Jewell, the game warden, who accompanied the hunt, made arrangements for notifying the authorities that it might be called for. It was remarked that some one probably has shot at a buck and hit a doe instead. Mr. Davis raised his bow aloft and said, "that would never happen with this."

Lacking a deer of their own, the huntsmen went back to the farm and posed for pictures grouped about a deer that Mr. Tidey had shot with a shotgun on Friday. When this armed truce was over they took the field again, but with no better luck. They saw more deer, but only at distances which precluded shooting.

DR. TOYAMA NEW PRESIDENT OF ST. PAUL'S UNIVERSITY

The Rt. Rev. Charles S. Reifsnider, D. D., president of Rikkyo Gakuin, today formally announced the election by the Board of Trustees of Dr. Ikuzo Toyama, Professor of Dermatology of Tokyo Imperial University, as the new president of St. Paul's University, succeeding Dr. Shigeharu Kimura, who resigned last summer. Dr. Toyama will assume his new office as head of Rikkyo University on April 1.

Professor Toyama is one of the outstanding medical men of Japan in the field of Dermatology and brings to his new post considerable executive ability. He has been head of his department at Tokyo Imperial since September, 1926, while during the preceding six years he was head of the College of Medicine of the Tohoku Imperial University at Sendai, and professor in the Sendai institution from 1907 to 1920. SENDAI NOTES

A very delightful recital of music was presented in the chapel of Miyagi College on the evening of Tuesday, January 19th, by Miss Alice Ilsley, pianist, and Miss Marie Leidal, soprano, both of the music faculty of Miyagi College. The program was opened by Miss Leidal singing three Beethoven selections, the concert aria, Ha Treuloser, Verrater; Ich Liebe Dich, and Adelaide, accompanied by Miss Ilsley, who then played two Chopin Etudes and the Ballade in G minor. Miss Leidal next sang an aria from the opera Ernani by Verdi, after which Miss Ilsley played the Rhapsody in F sharp minor by Dohnanyi and Toccata from Concerto No. 5 by Saint Saens, and Miss Leidal closed the program with four songs in English. Lo! Here the Gentle Lark by Bishop, Lullaby by Scott, There are Fairies at the Bottom of Our Garden by Lehmann, and Joy by Watts. Both Miss Leidal and Miss Ilsley responded to the enthusiasm of the audience with several encores. They will repeat the recital this coming Friday evening in Yokohama under the auspices of the Yokohama Womans' Club.

Restoring Paintings By Modern Methods

Restoration Of Velasquez Paintings Cause Controversy; Microscope Invaluable

To clarify the controversy, now acute, concerning the recent cleaning of the great Velasquez, "Portrait of Phillip IV," in the National Gallery, some understanding of the actual processes of painting and of the problems involved in the cleaning of pictures may be of help. The accusation recurs almost every time that a well-known masterpiece is cleaned that with the dirty varnish the delicate and all-essential glazes on which the final subtlety of the painting depends have been lost, so that a great masterpiece is defaced into little more than a rude sketch.

An ordinary oil painting of the "Old Master" type is usually painted in about three layers: the groundwork, sometimes done in tempera; the painting, which was done in oils; and a final finish with semi-transparent glazes often of pigment mixed with oil and varnish. After a long period of drying, the picture was then varnished to protect it from the atmosphere and to bring up the brilliance of the coloring.

A Delicate Problem

Sometimes the glazes were mixed with a soft-resin varnish, in which case the composition of the glaze and of the final varnish are dangerously alike, or sometimes the varnish itself is made up with a hard-resin dissolved in oil, in which case the composition of the varnish becomes dangerously close to that of the oil paint itself. Naturally, the removal of so tenuous a skin of varnish is a most delicate problem, but today the really capable restorer does not think in terms of even thousandths of an inch, but in films of an almost molecular thinness.

The old haphazard methods used soap and water, lyes or even acids, and often irreparable damage was done. As Mr. Kenneth Clark pointed out in "The Times," most pictures painted before 1800 have been cleaned like this at least twice, and what glazes do survive have done so by the grace of God. Today the restorer has all the aids of science: infra-red, ultraviolet, and X-rays to warn him of restorations; the tintometer to measure accurately color values; the polariscope and the spectroscope to test the ages of mediums and varnishes; the microscope, the photo-microscope and the analyst to detect the slightest presence of pigment in any material removed.

Pigment and Varnish

By means of a hypodermic needle an accurate microscopic cross section of the layers of pigment and of varnish can be taken, measured, and tested. By means of special apparatus the coats of varnish can be removed one layer at a time.

In "The Observer" of September 20 an account was given of the astonishing feats that Mr. Kennedy North had done while restoring the Colman watercolors in the Colman Collection. Compared with these a cleaning such as that done to the Velasquez is no more than journeyman's work. When, as Mr. Kenneth Clark states, the age of the varnish can be accurately measured, the removal of that varnish and of nothing else is a simple job, besides proving that the picture had been cleaned before and the glazes, if any, "skinned off" long ago.

There does, however, remain the problem, and one has no reason at all to doubt that the gallery officials are perfectly conversant with it, whether Velasquez did or did not deliberately adapt his painting to be covered with a final, general, warm, 'Oriental" varnish. An analysis of the actual pigments used in the Rokeby Venus suggests that this might have been the case. But on the other hand there is no doubt that the famous portrait was designed to be hung in a room very much darker than the present National Gallery, and the mere diminishment of light would act almost as a veiling varnish.

The "Gallery" Tint

On the other hand we, as a nation, are notorious for liking our facts clouded with the camouflage of sentiment. In pictures a nice, rich, soupy varnish is the equivalent of sentiment and gives that "gallery tint," the disappearance of which so seriously disturbs those who have got accustomed to it.

In this controversy we must apparently choose between the painters and the experts. Painters love pictures because they paint, but experts love pictures for their own sakes, and of the two I believe the love of the expert to be not only a purer passion, but a more exacting one.

One painter, Augustus John, has expressed approval of the cleaning, and with him I confess that I prefer to see Velasquez as near as possible to what those former cleaners have left us, rather than clouded, though perhaps etherealized, by the dirt and discolored varnish of a hundred years.

...sinking Arrests Red Conspirators; Raises Press Ban

3 Leaders Of Communist Plot Prosecuted; 9 Are Released

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

HSINKING, Jan. 20—The press ban was lifted here today on an anti-Manchoukuo conspiracy attempted by Japanese agents of the Shanghai branch of the International Communist Party since the fall of 1935.

Three leaders of the Communist plot have been formally prosecuted and nine other Japanese arrested have been released on reprimand, it is also revealed. The three conspirators indicted include Ryuki Soyejima (34), Sadakichi Kawai (37) and Hirotoshi Tejima (31).

Kept In Touch With Shanghai

Following their entrance into Manchoukuo from the South, these Red elements immediately started activities evading the strict guard measures on the part of Japanese and Manchouku police and troops to collect information with regard to the defense arrangements and administrative developments in the new Empire. They had been keeping in close touch with their headquarters in Shanghai in the meanwhile in connection with their maneuvers in Manchoukuo.

Secret endeavors were also exerted by those subversive agents in various parts of the country to create Communist cells as well as to secure additional members of their organizations.

The first suspect of the plot to be rounded up was Ryuki Soyejima, a native of Saga Prefecture, Kyushu, Japan, who was arrested by the metropolitan police authorities on January 9 of last year. Pursuing the statements elicited from Soyejima, a vigorous roundup campaign was carried out on a nation-wide scale by the police authorities and twelve arrests have been made subsequently.

The three leading agents, Soyejima, Kawai and Tejima, are stated to have been staying in Shanghai more than five years in the past and associated themselves with all available instruments to organize a secret society to intensify the struggle between the Japanese and Chinese nations. Securing the participation of many students of the Tung Wen College in Shanghai, they were engaged in active movements for some time in the international port city.

Shortly after the outbreak of the Shanghai incident in 1932, those Japanese conspirators were ordered by the Communist headquarters in Shanghai to proceed to Manchoukuo, it is also revealed.

British Stand Firm On Colonies Issue

"a gambler's throw" by striking at Czechoslovakia or by more drastic intervention in Spain.

"Pay no heed to such conjectures," The Express said. "The Germans will not make war. For one reason alone this is certain. Germany is not ready. It is very far from having reached that stage."

Peril Seen in German Course

An editorial in the Sunday Times said:

"It would be impossible for France to stand by indefinitely while a powerful German Army conquered Spain and organized it as a base of operations against France's rear. Yet this is what the German Government will find itself committed to unless at the eleventh hour it can be induced to halt its progress down the slippery incline.

"The further it goes the stronger will become the argument, from the standpoint of prestige, constraining it to go further. The present stage may be nearly the last at which it will remain not too difficult for Berlin to draw back to prevent a local adventure from growing into a much wider catastrophe."

Informed circles gave little credence to reports that France and Soviet Russia were bringing increasing pressure to bear on Britain for active intervention in the Spanish conflict. It was said there was little reason to believe that France was in any way prepared to desert Britain's lead to gain a temporary advantage over Germany.

Foreign Office officials said it was "not impossible" that Britain might join with France, Germany and Italy to force peace in Spain if Hitler withheld all aid from the Spanish Insurgent regime. These officials asserted, however, that such a move would be "only a variation in the mediation proposals of Britain and France."

The British Government waited for Italy's reaction to latest developments surrounding the Spanish War, especially for a reply to the British and French appeal for closer cooperation to enforce non-intervention in Spain.

She Knew Him

A country woman went to the barracks to see her son, who had joined up some time, and as his name was Smith it was difficult to locate him. The sergeant on guard said to the woman:

"There's Smith in the officers' mess. I wonder if that's him?"

"Well," said the woman, "'e was always in some mess or another when he was at 'ome, so it's 'im right enough."—Montreal Star.

Bureaucracy Shakeup
Goal Is Efficiency

security, the $850,000,000 in interest charges on the public debt, the $600,000,000 in the budget for debt retirement, the $1,000,000,000 for national defense, the $600,000,000 for veterans' pensions and benefits, the $300,000,000 for the C. C. C. nor the great part of the $1,500,000,000, conservatively estimated, which will be spent for the President's recovery and relief program in the coming year. The overwhelming bulk of the Federal outlay will not even be touched by the contemplated form of reorganization.

But beyond the item of some small savings and some curtailment of personnel, or at least a curb on its expansion, there is a very practical and highly desirable objective foreseen in a comprehensive reorganization. This lies in the field of administrative efficiency. As the President's advisers see it, an efficiently operating Federal establishment means better service to the country and indirect savings of substantial proportions in the long run for the nation's economic machine as a whole. It is physically impossible for the President as chief executive to keep in touch with 150 agencies of one kind or another. Proper administration requires their co-ordination under responsible officers few enough in number to be in intimate contact with the President.

The first problem of the reorganizers is the long list of new Federal agencies which have come into existence with the New Deal. An extensive but probably incomplete list of them follows:

Agriculture Adjustment Administration.
Central Statistical Board.
Commodity Credit Corporation.
Electric Home and Farm Authority.
Emergency Conservation Work (C. C. C.).
Export-Import Bank of Washington.
Farm Credit Administration.
a. Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.
Federal Alcohol Administration.
Federal Communications Commission.
Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works.
a. Housing Division.
Federal Emergency Relief Administration.
*Federal Home Loan Bank Board.
a. Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.
b. Home Owners' Loan Corporation.
Federal Housing Administration.
*Federal Power Commission.
Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.
Foreign-Trade Zones Board.
National Emergency Council.
a. United States Information Service.
National Labor Relations Board.
National Munitions Control Board.
National Re-employment Service.
National Resource Committee.
Railroad Retirement Board.
*Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
Resettlement Administration.
Rural Electrification Administration.
Securities and Exchange Commission.
Social Security Board.
Tennessee Valley Authority.
The National Archives.
Works Progress Administration.
a. National Youth Administration.
U. S. Maritime Commission.

* Started in Hoover administration, but scope of activities expanded.

To this list should be added, as part of the problem of associating kindred Federal activities, such pre-New Deal independent agencies as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Tariff Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the Budget Bureau, the Civil Service Commission, the Board of Tax Appeals, the Veterans' Administration, United States Employes Compensation Commission, General Accounting Office, United States Railroad Administration, War Finance Corporation (still liquidating the World War), National Mediation Board, the Aeronautical Board, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the Board of Surveys and Maps, Claims Commissions for Germany and Mexico, Boundary Commissions, International Fisheries Commission, National Capital Park and Planning Commission, Commission of Fine Arts, American Battle Monuments Commission, Smithsonian Institution, and other lesser commissions and agencies.

In addition to the problem of relating these activities is the even more difficult problem of realigning activities now within the main Federal departments. Taking the Treasury Department as an example, there is no apparent reason at present for having in this department the Bureau of Public Health Service.

The procurement division of the Treasury is also out of place, handling, as it does, the construction of many Federal office buildings as well as the purchase of many supplies. Within the Interior and Agriculture Departments are functions also which each department claims as its own.

New Welfare Department Likely

The final set-up to be proposed by the President is considered unlikely to do away with any of the present departments, although some of their bureaus may be shifted around. At least one new department, a Department of Social Welfare, to handle relief, social services and perhaps social security, is held likely to be created. If there are independent agencies left in existence separate from the departments they probably will be grouped in a limited number of establishments.

Likely to stir up even more commotion than the shuffling of bureaus, however, is the President's plan to split the judicial and administrative functions of quasi-judicial commissions such as the Federal Trade and Interstate Commerce Commissions. The procedure before some of these commissions is relatively so old and well established that the proposed change would stir up no end of commotion. The proposal, however, has had the backing of such conservative and legally expert influence as committees of the American Bar Association.

Administrative Court Suggested

So far the President has not gone deeply into the details of this program. He is convinced, however, that the administrative activities of the independent commissions should be directly under the Chief Executive. The Bar Association committee has recommended the establishment of an administrative court which would make the judicial decisions now rendered by the commission. In such a court there might be divisions to handle particular kinds of cases.

The talk about reorganization, however, has cropped up often before now. The accomplishments to date invariably have been small.

No Spanish Gold

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

VALENCIA, Jan. 20—Emphasizing that there are no Spanish gold holdings abroad, a semi-official note issued here today states, "The gold which left Spain was not intended to form gold deposits." It was further pointed out that despite the outflow of gold and six months of civil war, Spain still occupies fourth rank among the nations of the world enjoying the largest gold holdings.

It was also emphasized that these holdings are at present in the lawful possession of the Bank of Spain and are being kept within loyalist territory under the control of the Valencia Government.

Meanwhile, the general public as well as authoritative quarters expressed gratification today with regard to the passage in Foreign Secretary R. Anthony Eden's speech before the British House of Commons yesterday saying that Spain's fate and the ultimate form of the Spanish

Soviet Rail Slump Brings Stern Steps

Government Determined To Fix Blame For Halt In Gains Under Kaganovitch

MOSCOW, Dec. 23.—The Soviet railway system, which under L. M. Kaganovitch has made remarkable progress since his appointment as Commissar for Transport less than two years ago, is now slumping badly. The government is taking stern measures to remedy the situation.

Four of the most important officials of the Orenburg line, serving a region rich in mineral resources and agriculture, are now on trial, accused of sabotage intended to disrupt the railway's work so as to hinder State enterprises, says the New York Times. The charge of sabotage has frequently brought death penalties in the past.

The accused, all of whom have been removed from their posts, are G. V. Podshivalin, former head of the Orenburg railway; his assistant, N. E. Chirkoff; A. F. Pashkevich, former traffic superintendent, and his assistant, V. I. Ryabokon.

Two Petlura Adherents

According to the indictment Mr. Ryabokon was Minister of Railways in the late General Simon Petlura's government in the Ukraine which during the civil war united with German invaders against the Bolsheviki. It is asserted that he previously was sentenced to ten years for sabotage. Mr. Pashkevich is alleged to have served in the Petlura armies.

The indictment specifically charges the four defendants conspired to disrupt locomotive service and to reduce the number of freight cars available for loading, thus preventing the shipment of important government freight, purposely distorted ordens of the Commissariat of Transport and caused wrecks which increased in number from month to month.

The case is being prosecuted by G. M. Segal, chief prosecutor for railway transport, before the Transport Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R.

The trial focuses attention again on the government's strenuous effort to build up the transport system, which from Czarist times onward has been the weakest link of Russia's industrial and military network. Its shortcomings have given the Kremlin great concern in view of the possibility of war.

Revitalized Rail System

Mr. Kaganovitch, who is one of the Kremlin's most active go-getters, revitalized the railways immediately after taking office. He raised carloadings from fewer than 60,000 daily to a peak of 116,000 last May Day. Both freight and passenger services improved in many directions and the Soviet poured billions of rubles into improvements and extensions.

Something has happened in recent months. Carloadings hovered around 100,000 daily for a while, then sagged until they are now below 80,000.

Wrecks and breakdowns have become menacing and costly. Five railway men—engineers, train dispatchers and the like—were shot for causing wrecks. Many others have been sentenced to prison, these were found guilty of persistent negligence or, in some cases, pronounced deliberate saboteurs.

In the struggle to make the railways efficient the Transport Commissariat recently has been recruiting discharged soldiers, hoping to gain by the disciplined devotion of these picked young men.

New Device Scrubs Smoky Air Of Cities

Poisonous Fumes Removed At Smokestacks By Technique Described To Chemists

The development of a new engineering technique for purifying the smoke-laden air over big cities was announced in New York recently.

The discovery, which promises to promote the health of millions and safeguard property, besides tapping a vast new reservoir of mineral wealth, was described at the closing session of the two-day symposium on "Absorption and Extraction," sponsored by the American Chemical Society, at Columbia University. It is the work of Dr. H. F. Johnstone, Associate Professor of Chemical Engineering, and A. D. Singh, research chemical engineer, both of the faculty of the University of Illinois.

The new technique, which was described as "air conditioning a city's atmosphere," passes air through a "scrubbing" process which eliminates sulphur chloride, nitrous and hydrochloric acid fumes, the three gases chiefly responsible for poisoning the air we breathe. These gases in the atmosphere of big cities are believed to be extremely harmful, says the New York Times. In heavy concentrations they cause death, while continued exposure to air containing even very small quantities of the fumes leads to generally lowered health and may be responsible for lung and stomach ailments.

Danger to Health

The atmosphere of New York, Pittsburgh, Chicago and other highly industrialized cities contains a quantity of these fumes which may measure from two to six parts per million cubic feet of air, Professor Johnstone and Mr. Singh estimated. They explained that about three parts of the gases per million cubic feet of air can affect the nostrils and injure the health.

The new technique not only purifies the air by ridding the city atmosphere of this pollution, but yields, at the same time, new stores of sulphur, thus opening up the prospect of the day when, the nation's natural sulphur deposits exhausted, chemists may mine the air for the mineral.

Dr. James H. Kimball, meteorologist in charge of the United States Weather Bureau, commented that any process for purifying the air of "our smoky big cities" would mean "a great boon" for the country. He explained that experimenters in the past had been unable to overcome what appeared to be the prohibitive cost of installing air purifying apparatus. A technique making possible a "practical" system for giving city inhabitants pure air would add immeasurably to the welfare and happiness of millions of people and would add many millions of dollars to the country's wealth, he predicted.

Spurred on to their research by the sudden death of nearly 100 persons in the Meuse Valley in Belgium in December, 1930, as the result of heavy concentration of gaseous fumes in the air, Dr. Johnstone and Mr. Singh now have brought their investigations to the point where experiments on a semi-commercial scale have been "very encouraging" and hold out "even greater promise" for the future. The Utilities Research Commission of Chicago cooperated with the Engineering Experiment Station of the University of Illinois in the tests with the stack gases emanating from boiler furnaces at the university.

The new process consists of "scrubbing" the air near the industrial plants that are responsible for filling the atmosphere with gaseous fumes by passing the poisoned air, at the rate of a million and a half cubic feet a minute, through a sodium sulphite solution in a great tower. The sodium sulphite is then chemically treated to recover the sulphur dioxide and to get a sodium sulphite solution for repeating the cycle.

The correct designing of the "scrubbers" is essential for the success of the process, the authors of the paper said. These "scrubber," with the aid of the solvent they contain, remove by absorption 98 per cent of the sulphur dioxide from gases harboring only 0.2 to 0.3 per cent by volume.

"The treatment of such large quantities of gases to remove a relatively dilute constituent is a new and unique engineering problem," Professor Johnstone said. "The quantity of gas may readily exceed a million cubic feet per minute and because of the small concentrations involved the rate of absorption is none too great. Furthermore, the elimination of sulphur compounds must be accomplished without interfering with the normal operation of the power station."

Professor Johnstone concluded that a grid type of scrubber was most efficient. Such scrubbers can be built of small wooden laths, spaced at proper intervals, and need be only slightly larger in diameter than the stack itself and only 15 to 20 feet high, he said.

Predicts Science Might Outlaw War

Dr. Bayley Says Removing Demand For Mineral Resources Would Serve Purpose

CINCINNATI, Dec. 29.—A view that science might eventually outlaw war by removing the demand for mineral resources, was expressed by Dr. William S. Bayley, former Professor of Geology at the University of Illinois and retiring president of the Mineralogical Society of America, at the joint convention today of that society and the Geological Society of America, says the New York Times.

Dr. John L. Rich, Associate Professor of Economics Geology, University of Cincinnati, advanced as a theory that "blistering" of the earth's surface into mountains and volcanoes may be due to radioactive heating within the earth by such minerals as uranium and thorium.

Dr. Bayley said that mineralogy was beginning to play a new part in international politics.

"Since the World War it has been evident that the most fertile cause of strife between nations is the necessity of those nations that are over-populated to seek more land or increase their resources and become more industrialized.

"The development of industries, however, depends very largely upon mineral resources. If these are not present in sufficient quantities it is thought necessary to seek them outside the nation's own boundary. Germany, Italy and Japan furnish illustrations of countries which are restless because of their great lack of resources within their own boundaries."

Dr. Bayley said the time was passed when any nation had merely to send out an expedition to take possession of unclaimed land, and that, "today there are few areas of potential mineral resources that are not under the watch of some great power."

Scientists hope, he said, that study will result in finding a peaceful solution of the problem.

Dr. Rich in discussing the theory of blistering of the earth said it was conceivable that "new ranges of mountains will be formed at some point on the earth's surface in the future through the same process."

All rocks contain varied minerals which by radioactive action cause more heat than can be radiated through the earth's crust, he said: "Local melting of the lower part of the crust provides a mechanism for mountain building and associated phenomena."

Dr. Rich said that the blister of molten rock resulting from internal heating resembled in structure and action a heat blister raised on human skin by a burn. Two minerals, uranium and thorium, he explained, are sepecially rich in materials which cause radioactive heating under the earth's crust, uranium being a source of radium.

Denies World Conference Plan

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16—President Franklin D. Roosevelt yesterday denied rumors that he had invited foreign powers to hold a world economic conference. The Chief Executive explained that the forthcoming visit to the United States of Mr. Walter Runciman who is a personal friend of the President, did not mean that such a conference was in the making.

INTERNATIONAL CLUB MEETING

Mrs. Hazel H. Gorham will speak at a meeting of the Tokyo International Club to be held at 7 p.m. Wednesday at the American Embassy. Her subject will be Things in Japan that Have Interested Foreigners.

WEEK-END IN NIKKO

Mr. and Mrs. William Yuni of the American Embassy, spent the week-end in Nikko.

NETHERLANDS SOCIETY ORGANIZED

The Dutch residents in Kobe have organized a Netherlands Society. The officers are: president, Mr. P. de Vries; vice-president, and treasurer, Mr. P. K. van Diggele; secretary, Mr. W. P. Hasselman, and the committee members are Mrs. W. F. H. Brandon, Mr. F. Alion, Mr. J. H. van Loo and Mr. J. Schaafsma.

WEEK-END IN IWAHARA

The skiing party composed of Mrs. Aguilar, the wife of the Mexican Minister, Mrs. Boysen, Miss Graciela Aguilar, Miss Beatrice Bertouch-Lehn, and Mr. Alfred Niplow spent the week-end skiing in Iwahara.

TO LEAVE FOR MOSCOW

The Soviet Ambassador, Mr. Constantin Youreneff, will leave Tokyo at the beginning of February for Moscow on a business trip. Mrs. Youreneff and their son will not accompany him.

TOKYO ENGLISH SPEAKING SOCIETY MEETING

The New Year meeting and dinner of the Tokyo English Speaking Society will be held at the Rainbow Grill, Osaka Building, near Uchisaiwai-cho tramstop, across from Hibiya Park, at 6 p.m. Friday, January 29.

The Rev. and Mrs. Charles Bishop will give their 86 years' reminiscences touching six different wars including the American Civil War. Some popular college songs will be sung, led by Mrs. Shigeru Fujimoto. Members are cordially invited to bring their families and friends.

The office of the Society is at 30 Shirokane Sanko-cho, Shiba-ku, and the telephone number is Takanawa (44) 3015.

SPEAKS AT TOKYO WOMEN'S CLUB

Mrs. Gordon Bowles spoke about her experiences on a recent anthropological expedition in Tibet at a meeting of the Tokyo Women's Club held at the American Club Monday.

TO RETURN TO TOKYO

Mr. Kieth Doull is expected to return to Tokyo on the Empress of Asia which arrives in Yokohama Thursday February 4.

NIPPON RACE CLUB MEETING

The Nippon Race Club is holding its annual general meeting in the offices of Butterfield and Swire, 7 Yamashita-cho, Yokohama at 5:30 p.m. Friday, February 12. The meeting will be to recieve the committee reports, elect a captain and committee for the coming year and to handle the general business. Nominations for which the consent of the nominees must be obtained, must be in the hands of the honorary secretary three days before the meeting.

LEAVES FOR KOBE

Mrs. W. Neobel, wife of the German Counsellor, left Monday for Kobe where she will spend about a week with Mrs. W. Wagner, the wife of the German consul-general.

SKI INSTRUCTOR AND PARTY ARRIVE

Mr. York Heintz, ski instructor and a party from Shanghai, arrived in Tokyo Sunday. They left at 8:30 p.m. today for the Shiga Plateau, Nagano Prefecture. This group is composed of Mrs. E. Kann, Miss V. Hardt, Mr. Wolfram Kreibel, Mr. G. A. Zehmer, Miss L. Remedios, Miss Alys Whitchi, Mr. D. R. Fleming, Mrs. M. Brill, Mr. F. Steinle, Mr. P. Ungerer, Miss H. Unterberger, Miss E. E. Virden, Mr. E. Lenzlinger, Dr. F. G. Eickhoff and Mr. C. E. Viseering. Several Tokyo residents are joining the party, including Miss G. Kuehl and Miss E. Timme.

WEEK END IN KAMAKURA

The American military attache, Lieutenant-Colonel Carey Crane, the French secretary, Baron James Baeyens, the American secretaries, Mr. Joseph McGurk, Mr. E. S. Crocker and Mr. George Andrews, the Belgian secretary, Mr. Maurice Iweins d'Eeckhoutte, the American assistant naval attache, Lieutenant Ethelbert Watts, the French secretary, Mr. Arnaud d'Andurain de Maytie, and Mr. Gregor C. Merrill spent the weekend at Kamakura.

TO HOLD A LECTURE

Dr. Georges A. Patey of the Maison Franco-Japonaise de Tokyo will give a lecture under the title of the "Tuberculous rheumatism" at the lecture hall of the Maison at 5 p.m. today. The lecture will be illustrated by some lantern slides and will be open to the public.

THE HAKUJUTSU ART SOCIETY'S EXHIBITION

The annual exhibition of the Hakujutsu Art Society was opened at the Tokyo Prefectural Art Galleries, Uyeno Park, Tuesday. The hanging committee of the society received more than 2,500 exhibits of which 250 were passed by the committee. The society is one of the civil art groups in Japan and the members are outstanding oil painters. The exhibition will be open until February 8.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE SHUNDAI ART SOCIETY

The 12th annual exhibition of the Shundai Art Society will be opened at the Tokyo Prefectural Art Galleries, Uyeno Park, from Wednesday January 27 until Sunday February 14. This society is an organization of the pupils of Mr. Saburosuke Okada, foremost oil painter of Japan and member of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. The exhibition consists of two parts, one for oil painting and the other of industrial arts and handycrafts.

TO HOLD VOCAL RECITAL

Mr. Ryozo Okuda, tenor singer will hold a vocal recital at the Nippon Seinenkai Hall, Aoyama, at 7:30 p.m. Thursday, January 28. He will sing several classic and modern songs including some Japanese popular songs.

Soviet Trade With Germany Cut 65 PC

ders for machinery, which formerly went to Germany, are now going elsewhere, many of them to the United States. The only big machinery purchase made recently from Germany was a Krupp-built mill for making steel cables.

Electric welding equipment has been bought from France, and a tinplate mill and an oil-cracking unit from the United States. The Soviet Union is still importing considerable quantities of goods from Japan in payment for the Chinese Eastern Railway—principally raw and semi-finished consumers' goods and food products, but also fishing boats, electrical apparatus, steam dredges and other things.

But although the United States is among the other countries now replacing Germany as a supplier of the Soviet Union, this trend has come too late to be a bonanza. Germany skimmed off the cream while Soviet Russia was launching her industry and had to buy machinery abroad. Now Russia produces and even exports machinery to some degree.

Soviet imports of machinery and metal goods, which totaled nearly $600,000,000 in 1931, are expected to total only slightly more than $100,000,000 this year. One substantial purchase from America last year was discontinued altogether this year. It is officially announced that the Soviet Union is buying only 17,000 tons of cotton this year, none of it from America. It is all being obtained by barter with various Asiatic countries.

Self-Sufficiency Foreseen

Soviet officials predict the country will be able to do entirely without imports, if that should be desired, by the beginning of the third Five-Year Plan on Jan. 1, 1938. Imports will not be cut off altogether, however, unless necessary, because the Soviet Union wants technical novelties, high-grade steels and the like, which it is not yet able to produce advantageously itself.

In view of the strained feeling with which the Soviet Government is now viewing Germany, there is interest in a long obituary article in the newspaper Izvestia today on the late Col. Gen. Hens von Seekt, reviewing his creation of the postwar German Army and his belief in the necessity of friendly relations between Germany and the Soviet Union. Izvestia says his death just now has proved what his friends always said of him—he was a lucky man.

"Death freed him from an inevitable fate—that of witnessing the destruction of the army he created in a war that will be started and headed by Hitler," says Izvestia.

His death increases the likelihood of war, Izvestia continues, because now there is no restraint on the "Hitlerite adventurers," but it also makes surer Germany's defeat.

Trade Accords Held Best Way To Keep Peace

Carnegie Endowment Lists Economic Objectives For Coming Year

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace sees in the removal of trade barriers and in the conclusion of multilateral agreements, open to all comers," the chief instruments available for the safeguarding of world peace. These it places at the head of its program for 1937, according to an announcement given out recently at New York, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

The endowment will wage its campaign for world peace chiefly along economic lines, the announcement indicated in a 12-point program which leads with provision for the furthering of efforts to conclude multilateral pacts with a view to stimulating international trade.

Pending the development of a situation favorable to such negotiations, the announcement says, the endowment is for the conclusion of bilateral treaties, "conciously used as an instrument for the demobilization of trade barriers," and for "the deliberate inclusion in all such treaties of the most-favored-nation clause as a means to realize that purpose.

Favored-Nation Clause

It is for the general use of this most-favored-nation clause "in its unconditional form, with a possible exception in the case of countries which, even after the restrictions of more orderly currency conditions, would continue to practice discriminatory quotas or foreign exchange regulations."

Point five of the endowment's program called for "the establishment of an international center which shall compile indices for measuring competitive incidence of protection in the various countries in order to encourage the reduction of excessive barriers to trade."

Point six calls for "the abolition, preferably by multilateral agreement, of import quotas as soon as the way to a definite recovery of world trade has been paved by appropriate monetary or other measures." An acceleration of this process by the substitution of tariff quotas for import quotas during a transitory period also is favored.

Limiting Import Quotas

Other points in the program call for an orientation of commercial policy to set a limit on the use of import quotas for purposes of temporary expediency, "thus facilitating the establishment of a time-limit for their removal." The application to the quota system of a "fair play code" as laid down by the International Chamber of Commerce is also urged.

Other recommendations are the conclusion of regional unrestricted collective pacts "as long as the purpose and the results thereof are the increase of trade and the appeasement of nations;" the progressive establishment of the correct relations of national currencies which no longer represent a fair parity; and a joint declaration on monetary policy by the leading world powers."

This declaration is to cover the following points:

"The avoidance of currency depreciation as an instrument of international trade competition, the preservation and extension of the stability of rates if once adjusted to the necessities of the situation of each particular country, the elimination of seasonal variations in the value of currencies, and the recognition of the desirability for a transition to a more permanent regime without undue delay."

Finally, the endowment goes on record for "the progressive abolition of exchange and clearing regimes, in the measure that it has been possible to solve the problems of international indebtedness, to resume international lending and to restrain uncontrolled flights of capital by standstill agreements.

The announcement says that this program "is one of the direct results of the unofficial international conference held at Chatham House, London, in March, 1935," and that it joins with the council of the International Chamber of Commerce "in presenting these suggestions for the serious consideration of all thinking people."

Solem Is Named Football Coach Of Syracuse U

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 2—Ossie M. Solem, director of athletics and head coach of football at the University of Iowa since 1932, today was named head coach of football at Syracuse University. He succeeds Vic Hanson, former Orange star, recently resigned after disastrous season.

At the same time, the committee named to pick both a new athletic director and a football coach announced that the former position will remain vacant. It is understood that Dan Jessee, of Trinity College, was the choice for the directorship, but that he changed his mind after Trinity authorities raised his salary. Jessee also wished to remain in the coaching field and the duties at Syracuse call for only executive work, which included a strict supervision over physical education for some 5,500 men and women students in addition to intercollegiate activities.

Solem is believed to have signed a three-year contract calling for a salary of $7,500 annually.

118 Applied for Two Posts

The committee received applications for the directorship and coaching job from 118 candidates. It will continue to function until the director is named, probably within two weeks. Several Orange alumni are being prominently mentioned, including Eddie Brown, a former Orange athletic star, who now resides in New York, and Lew Andreas, coach of basketball at Syracuse and a professor in the college of physical education. Andreas served as head football coach here for a three-year period. His knowledge of intercollegiate activities and the fact that he is the key worker in Syracuse's elaborate and compulsory physical education program may prove important assets, as he is known to have made application for the position.

The official statement issued by the committee:

Committee Issues Statement

"Acting Chancellor William P. Graham today confirmed the appointment of Mr. Ossie Solem, director of athletics and head football coach at the University of Iowa, as head football coach at Syracuse University. The appointment was made by the administrative board on athletics on the recommendation of a special committee appointed to make a study of candidates.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

high standard of living for every one be attained."

A new study of the subject confined to the highest income bracket group, just prepared by the People's Lobby, of which Prof. Colston E. Warne of Amherst College is president, recalls that the 1929 top national income of $78,632,000,000 had sunk to $53,587,000,000 in 1935. In that year, according to the study, "about one sixtieth of the families received considerably over one eighth of the national income."

Income Tax Spread

Basing its report on Commerce Department figures, it estimates there are 29,000,000 families in the United States. Two persons frequently make income tax returns in families in the upper income brackets, so it estimates that the 480,799 persons making returns of net income over $5000 represent about one sixtieth of all families. In 1935 their total income was $7,000,000,000.

This group of fortunately placed families drew about two fifths of their income from property, the study reports. The bigger the income was, the report states, the higher the percentage drawn from property. There were 7873, for example, with incomes of $50,000 to $100,000; these got 79 per cent from property. Of the 41 income tax returns showing net income of over $1,000,000, 99 per cent of the amount was drawn from property.

During the depression year of 1935, according to the Commerce Department, a total of $17,500,000,000 was paid out as dividends, royalties, interest, withdrawals and the like. Of this, the families in the top brackets received 15 per cent, according to the study. The same group paid income taxes and surtaxes in 1935 a total of $609,353,000, or an average of 10 per cent of their net income.

The report states:

"After paying all direct taxes they had left $5,332,664,000; this was over one seventh of total compensation paid to all United States employes, and over five sevenths of farmers' total income in 1935."

The people's lobby, which leans to the left in the economic matters, argues that much heavier federal income taxes might be applied and proposes that the surtax should start at $3000.

South America Enters Year With Hopes Soaring To Peak; Conaitions Best In Century

The 10 nations of South America, enhanced in stature by the peace spotlight turned upon them as a result of the recent Pan-American gathering at Buenos Aires, entered the new year with probably the best political and economic prospects since they threw off the Spanish colonial yoke a century ago, according to the Santiago correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Even though several republics are still struggling in the backwash of the "great crisis," date-lined Wall Street, November, 1929, all unanimously admit there never were such bright New Year prospects as today. Their optimism can be forgiven in the light of the noble way they, with their sister nations of the North, rang out the Old Year in the Argentine capital.

Continental Progress

The retrospect of the past year in South America affords a gratifying impression of continental recovery and progress. The process had started earlier. Even in 1933 the very urgency of the economic problems that confronted all of them had evoked a wholesome reaction and rallied the peoples in support of domestic reconstruction.

The recovery movement, steady and sure, was affected neither by the whimsicalities of national politics, such as barrack revolutions and leftist and rightist dictatorships, nor by the occasional war clouds of international misunderstanding.

This New Year's opinion is based largely on the progress achieved in the Old Year. With the Chaco and Letician problems well on the way to satisfactory solution, 1936 was devoid of international worries. The nations have had more time to tackle peace problems in which they had a common interest. There was a large increase in foreign trade, budgets were better balanced, and there were definitely higher prices for their products in the world markets—which meant more money to spend. The importance to South America of the rise in commodity values cannot be overestimated.

Important Events

From a continental viewpoint, there were several important events in 1936. The American Regional Labor Conference, held in Santiago, emphasized that South America would not be indifferent to the emigration requirements of overcrowded European countries and was prepared to open its gates to a reasonable volume of selected emigrants. The majority of the governments approached unanimity in an anti-Red front; the Atlantic seaboard powers constituted a police cordon to impede the infiltration of extremist agents.

The Latin peace movement was given great publicity in the gathering of Hispano-American Rotarians and the P. E. N. Club delegates; but the greatest step of all in the cause was the Pan-American Peace Conference, the historic results of which are still fresh in news memory.

The Argentines, of all South American peoples, have solid grounds for New Year optimism. Wheat crops and prices are satisfactory. Great Britain drove a hard bargain in renewing the Roca pact, but Argentine meat sales are fairly well guaranteed. For good or for ill, the country is closely linked to British economy. It seems to be mainly for good. At any rate, the word "crisis" has gone from the Argentine trade dictionary.

Finances in Good Shape

During 1936 extra money was spent on national defense. Finances were in good shape and trade levels satisfactory. Final returns will show the United States consolidated in its customary second place both in exports and imports. Argentina continued to be the only South American country fully discharging its original debt contracts. A November conversion operation confirmed its credit status in New York.

International prestige was further enhanced by the award of the Nobel peace prize to Foreign Minister Carlos Saavedra Lamas and his election to the Presidency of the League of Nations and the Pan-American Peace Conference. Foreign capital—even the British railroad investors, who had been having a thin time for years—reported better treatment during the year.

Brazilian optimism is more restrained for the coming year. The 1937 budget, with revenue and expenditures the highest in history, threatens a deficit of approximately $20,000,000. Despite past destruction, the country seems faced with a prospective surplus of at least 10,000,000 bags of coffee. Cotton development, astonishing as it has been, has yet to counterbalance coffee losses in the national trading sheet. As the Old Year faded foreign bondholders wondered whether the Vargas government would be able to continue the modest service on the external debt. The amounts outstanding Dec. 31 was £105,000,000, 757,000,000 francs $171,000,000.

Erratic Movement

There has been an erratic movement in foreign trade but there are reasonable prospects of a favorable balance approximating $50,000,000 for the year. Two five year plans are being debated—each of $90,000,000—one for public works and the other for defense.

There was a marked nationalist spirit during 1936, but toward the close President Vargas, who has never been a favorite with foreign capital, seemed to be watching his step more closely. The political situation became more interesting and promises to be more so in the coming year, as the presidential elections are scheduled for September. The Integralists, or "green shirt" fascists under Plinio Salgado, have become a power in the land, and an examination of the Constitution is said to have invalidated Vargas' candidature, should it materialize, for a second consecutive term.

Chile had another year of moderate revival under the Alessandri regime, with the political forces dividing to the left and right for the March elections in 1937. Nitrate was slightly and copper mining much better. The approximate favorable trade balance December 31 was $16,000,000. The national budget had a final surplus of roughly $5,000,000. Official figures will not be available until February.

Almost Boom Level

Peruvians can wish themselves a happy New Year and rest reasonably assured that it will be happy—economically. Trade has been at almost boom levels for the last 12 months, and the country continues to be the only one in South America without exchange control. Politically, Peru starts off in 1937 under a constitutional cloud

President Benavides, who hitherto has won praise for his sagacity and moderation, refused to "hand over" to the Leftist leader who apparently won the October general elections. He allowed himself to be re-elected for a further three-year period by a Congress whose mandate had expired. Fear of the Leftists—especially the "Apristas"—dictated this extralegal action, and President Benavides now governs with military backing. Electoral repercussions may be delayed if the trade boom continues.

Early in 1937 Col. Rafael Franco will celebrate his first anniversary as "totalitarian" dictator of Paraguay. Judging by 1936 experiences, his 1937 prospects are none too bright. Rigid censorship prevented the flow of impartial news, but repeated reports of revolt, labor trouble and wholesale arrests made the outside world believe that Colonel Franco was having a hard time to remain on top. His old comrades are demanding more liberalism, the Cabinet totters periodically, and the trade outlook is bad.

Better Trading

In Bolivia, where another army colonel—David Toro—has been dictator since June, there is better trading. The imposed price of tin should set the country on its feet again, despite Chaco war attrition and the unsuccessful totalitarian experiments. There is labor conscription in both countries and shortage of manpower has made selected immigration a paramount issue for 1937.

Better harvests of coffee, cotton, rice and kapok have improved Ecuadorean prospects for 1937, but sustained recovery will be necessary to dissipate the uncertainty generated by reduced foreign trading in recent years. Domestic manufacturing has helped to buoy up the domestic position. The advent of New Year finds the government principally concerned with the growth of radicalism. The military dictatorship that succeeded the presidency of Jose Velasco Ibarra has specialized in an anti-red drive. That the communist peril is a real one was proved only recently when several score soldiers perished in an unsuccessful revolt.

The leftist government of Colombia, headed by President Lopez, made a number of radical experiments during the course of the year and threatens to swerve much further to the left in 1937. The New Year was ushered in with new constitutional provisions authorizing seizure of private property without compensation and there were whisperings of a conservative revolution.

Omnibus Banking Law

The Old Year commenced with the promulgation of the so-called omnibus banking law by which the state strengthened its grip of national finances. The foreign trade structure did not appear affected by daring domestic experiments. Colombia, in fact, improved its position as the world's second largest producer of coffee, which accounts for 60 per cent of its exports. Ninety per cent of the coffee goes to the United States.

In Venezuela—frequently forgotten in the South American picture—President Contreras, so far, has well performed the peculiarly difficult tasks that were the inheritance of the 30-year dictatorship of General Gomez. The New Year will see a continuation of his forward, nationalist program in which both rightists and leftists have been able to forget many of their differences. During 1936 Lopez made a great effort in behalf of the "forgotten man" in agriculture. A labor law was also enacted on traditional South American lines. The leftists, however, are not completely assauged, and more difficulties are expected to come from their side of the political fence during the coming year.

Uruguay, after its experience with the Soviet diplomatic mission, which it expelled December, 1935, adopted a sterner attitude toward the communists during the following year. It was anxious, apparently, to dispel the unfavorable impression created in neighboring countries who had suffered from propaganda based on Montevideo. Today President Tarra appears to have a stronger grip on the Government than at any previous time, and, if trade continues to improve, the political position should be bettered in 1937. This country, like Argentina, benefits from British economic links.

Arthur Brisbane Earned Fortune As News-Writer

Writer And Executive Served Hearst Papers 39 Years; Began As A Reporter

Arthur Brisbane, one of the most widely read and highest paid newspaper writers in the world who died at his home, 1,215 Fifth Avenue, at 102d Street, New York, of heart disease at 5:25 o'clock on the morning of December 26, was one of the very few to make a fortune as a newspaper writer, according to the New York Times. He was 72 years old and had been employed by William Randolph Hearst for thirty-nine years, longer than any other of Mr. Hearst's employes.

Mr. Brisbane's newspaper columns, "Today" and "This Week," and his editorials were read by millions of Hearst readers throughout the United States.

15 Attacks in 3 Weeks

The attack of coronary thrombosis which caused Mr. Brisbane's death was the last of about fifteen such attacks that he had suffered in the last three weeks previous to his death. The attacks were characterized by the severe pains of angina pectoris.

In spite of his illness, Mr. Brisbane dictated on Thursday the column that appeared yetserday with the exception of the final paragraph. This was supplied by his son, Seward Brisbane. Hearst executives said that this paragraph was the only line ever written under Mr. Brisbane's name by any other than Mr. Brisbane and that this was the only occasion on which Mr. Brisbane did not write a full newspaper column.

Mr. Brisbane's last column contained his usual terse paragraphs which were directed toward such diverse subjects as Christmas, the alfalfa crop on his Mojave Desert ranch, the rounding up of wild horses by airplane, and the plan of Paul Robeson, Negro singer, to place his small son in a Soviet school. There was no mention of the gorilla, to whose brainless strength Mr. Brisbane often had compared the more intelligent, if less muscular, equipment of man.

Spent Summer in Italy

Associates and relatives of Mr. Brisbane said that his health had not been good for more than a year. He spent his last Summer in Italy with his son, Seward Brisbane, and Mr. Hearst. While there both he and Mr. Hearst suffered severe attacks of dysentery and Mr. Brisbane's recovery was slow. Late in August he left Italy to join his family on an island off the southern coast of France, where had had spent his vacations in his boyhood and there seemed to undergo a marked improvement.

Returning to this country in September, Mr. Brisbane took up his residence at his New York apartment.

When Mr. Brisbane was stricken Thursday, Dr. Leopold Steigletz, his physician, of 1,040 Park Avenue, was summoned. Dr. Steigletz went to the Brisbane residence accompanied by his assistant, Dr. Frederick Zeman of 111 East Eighty-eighth Street. They found Mr. Brisbane in a critical condition and he was placed in an oxygen tent. The physicians and a trained nurse remained at his bedside during the night.

When Mr. Brisbane died Mr Crary was the only member of the family to be notified immediately. The others were not informed of his death until a later hour in the morning. Dr. Steigletz said that Mr. Brisbane had lost consciousness several hours before he died.

Mr. Brisbane's entire immediate family was in the house at the time of his death. These were his wife, Mrs. Phoebe Cary Brisbane; Mr. and Mrs. McCrary, his son Seward; his three younger daughters, Emily, 16, and Alice, 13, both students at the French School, New York City, and Elinor, 12, a student at the Foxcroft School, Middlesex, Va., and a grandson, Michael McCrary, 9 months old.

Roosevelt Sends Message

Messages of condolence poured into the Brisbane home from all parts of the country. President and Mrs. Roosevelt, Governor and Mrs. Herbert H. Lehman and Mayor and Mrs. F. H. La Guardia were among those to express regret over Mr. Brisbane's death. Messages were received also from Hearst executives and other newspaper men in various parts of the country.

Mexico Teaches Chess To Army For War Value

120 Officers Are Instructed By National Champion, Who Will Lecture

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 20—The military value of chess has been recognized by the Mexican government in its recent introduction of the game into its curriculum of military studies. Mexican Army officers are being taught the game by Captain Jose J. Araiza, national champion.

During the last year Captain Araiza has taught three groups of Mexican officers, each composed of forty players. Beginning in January he will start a series of lectures in each of the country's military centers, instructing their staffs on the science and organization of the game.

The Mexican Army is teaching its officers chess, he says, to familiarize them with the problem of handling figures in terms of other figures, a characteristic of both chess and war.

Although the playing of chess is limited to sixty-four plays upon a square, war has no limits to its plays nor to the territory in which it is waged. Nevertheless, says Captain Araiza, the chess figures are regarded in terms of strength, just as the sections of an army are, and the discipline of moving such bodies with forethought and precision is an excellent training in war maneuvers.

A further element which allies chess with the movement of troops lies in the necessity which the game demands for anticipating the moves of the adversary. A good chess player can foresee sixteen future moves of his opponent, while the great Jose Capablanca achieved the longest combination ever made in a tournament when he anticipated twenty-six future moves, announced the outcome, and an hour and a half later won the game.

A further element of chess playing applicable to military science is the philosophical capacity for making immediate sacrifices to achieve future gains. This baiting of a trap with what seems an advantage to the opponent is one of the most far-sighted and skillful requirements of both the chessboard and the battlefield.

SAILING TODAY

Mr. Harry Suze, of Yokohama, is sailing today on the N.Y.K. liner Taiyo Maru for a short business trip to the United States.

ENTERTAINED AT DINNER

Captain and Mrs. C. H. Neill James entertained at dinner at their home Tuesday. Their guests included Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. F. den Boeft, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Davies, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Graham, Miss E. Coles and Mr. T. E. Bromley.

APPOINTED CHAIRMAN

Mr. E. L. Pennell has been appointed chairman of the membership committee for Tokyo of the Columbia Society which will give its annual ball on Monday, February 22, Washington's birthday. The ball will be held at the Hotel New Grand, Yokohama. Mr. Pennell has tried to get in touch with as many Americans to join the society and support the ball, but if there is anyone he has not reached who would like to attend he would be pleased to make arrangements.

A special dinner will be given at the American Club at 7 p.m. for those attending the ball and the whole party will go to Yokohama together.

CONTRACT BRIDGE PARTY

A duplicate contract bridge party will be held at the American Club Sunday from 5 p.m. A charge of ¥1 is being made for prizes and players are requested to supply their own cards. Mr. F. M. Gibson is arranging the party and providing his duplicate boards. He had asked that entrants make applications in order to facilitate arrangements. Dinner will be served later in the evening and if the players desire another contest will be held after dinner.

FAREWELL RECITALS BY MR. MISCHA ELMAN

Two farewell recitals by Mr. Mischa Elman will be held at the Hibiya Public Hall, at 7:30 p.m. Monday, February 15, and Tuesday, February 16. Tickets are obtainable at the Play-guide. Mr. Elman completed his five recitals in Tokyo Wednesday and will broadcast at the JOAK radio station at 8 p.m. Friday, then he will go to Osaka to give a series of recitals.

TO HOLD VOCAL RECITAL

Mr. Ryozo Obuda, tenor, will hold a recital at the Nippon Seinenkai Hall, Aoyama, at 7:30 p.m. today. He will sing some classic compositions and several modern Japanese songs at the recital.

THE FIRST COMPETITION OF MODERN JAPANESE MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS

The first competition of modern Japanese musical composition will be held under the auspices of the New Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo at the Hibiya Public Hall at 7:30 p.m., Friday. Mr. Joseph Rosenstock will direct the competition. Some five compositions by the leading Japanese composers will be submitted. The public will vote on the compositions at the audition.

ENTERTAIN AT COCKTAILS

Mr. and Mrs. G. J. Mulder entertained at a large cocktail party for a number of their friends at their home Wednesday.

ANNIVERSARY SALE

The committee of the Thrift Shop has announced that an anniversary sale will be held from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday. New articles will be displayed, old stock will be sold at greatly reduced prices and the food sale will include fresh pork sausage, rainbow trout, cakes and candies.

London Explores Plan For Better Films

provide special weekly matinees for children. These matinees are attended by nearly 600,000 young persons who are on the elementary school registers.

There are some 70 or more subjects registered by renters as suitable for exhibition to children. The aggregate cash receipts by exhibitors from child matinees are about £300,000 annually.

It would be possible, the speaker said, to treble the number of special matinee theaters and thereby to bring the receipts to £1,000,000 a year, in which case, at least half that sum would represent profits.

Big Demand Waiting

Under the circumstances, a good deal more could and should be done, it was decided. The child population of the country offers a very hungry public, and its needs are most inadequately met. While "A" films—those intended for adults—are distinctly unfortunate in their influence on the child, even "U" films—intended as they are for family consumption—too often fall short of child requirements.

The British child, it was contended, is essentially a peacemaker and rejoices in "getting things put right" from the most highly moral point of view—a trait, the conference agreed, which is highly worthy of cultivation, and which should be guarded lest the appeal of romance, so potent in the "dark, half-world atmosphere" of the cinema, should, by unhappy mismanagement, be associated with "grubby things."

Special Performances

Mr. Sidney Bernstein, managing director of the Bernstein Theaters, told of how efforts had been made by the trade to launch special child performances ever since the spring of 1928, but of how failure had been experienced, time and again, partly on account of some supposed antagonism on the part of educationists, parents, and the general public, partly because there had been a certain underlying notion in the trade that child performances should "do good" to the children instead of merely amusing them.

British Trade In North Europe

Unless Changes In Methods Are Made, Trade Won Will Soon Be Lost

Last summer the Advertising Association departed from its usual practice and, instead of holding its annual convention in Great Britain, organized a cruise, which enabled three hundred delegates to visit Copenhagen, Helinski, Stockholm, and Oslo, where the trade conditions existing between this country and Denmark, Finland, Sweden and Norway were investigated. According to the report, which has just been issued, the visit was a complete success, not only socially, but because it revealed the preference that exists in that part of Europe for British goods. It also enabled personal contacts, which cannot fail to be of value, to be established. The report first reviews the markets as a whole insistence being rather naturally placed on advertising, in connection with which some interesting features are disclosed, says Engineering. There follow four sections discussing each country individually and explaining their market conditions. Each of these sections is supplemented by figures, which are included by permission of the Board of Trade, and show in detail, by both quantities and value, the exports and imports between Great Britain and the four countries for the past six years. The position is therefore clear for all those interested to study and to act upon. The style of the report is neither official nor dry-as-dust, but is illuminated by many human and humorous touches. That the situation is viewed from a somewhat different aspect than is usual does not detract from its value.

Dealing with some of the points that seem to us to be of principal importance, the fact that in all four capitals the hosts spoke splendid English is stressed. Language need, therefore, be no handicap to the English business man who seeks to "blaze the trail" northwards. His task will also be made easier by the attraction which British goods evidently possess for the inhabitants of these countries, while the existence of stable currencies is another advantage. On the other hand, there is a certain sense of grievance at the way in which the trade agreements of a few years ago were concluded. To put it bluntly, the northern governments had pressure exerted on them; and had to agree to increase their imports in our favor under threat of discrimination against them. This opinion is not traversed in the report, and it may therefore be pointed out that our Government acted quite rightly in seeking to adjust a state of affairs that was very much out of balance. The result has, in fact, been a great improvement in British exports, though the view is expressed in the report that this has risen more from the efforts of the countries concerned to fulfil their treaty obligations, than from those of our own nationals. No evidence is, however, produced in support of this contention, and it may be that it proceeds from that determination to see the best in the behavior of hosts which notoriously follows visits to hospitably-inclined foreign countries.

There is more substance in the plea that the industrialists of this country might have made the arrangements more easy and convenient. It was, in fact, hinted on more than one occasion during the tour, that when the agreements lapsed, buyers would naturally turn to those countries which offered the most acceptable goods at competitive prices and on considerate trading terms. The good advice was therefore given that unless British manufacturers made friends while they were "sheltered," the trade recently obtained might be lost. At the same time it must not be forgotten that trade is reciprocal and that we cannot be expected to buy indefinitely from a country unless that country also buys proportionately from us.

As regards the present position, and this may perhaps be admitted, the importance of the markets offered by the four Baltic countries is not properly appreciated. Their aggregate population is 16,000,000 and last year they purchased from us 37,000,000¥ worth of goods. This is a value greater than that of any single foreign country, being more than twice as much as that purchased by France and more than 50 per cent in excess of that purchased by the United States. This state of things is a tribute to the excellence of British goods, no less than to the business methods and enterprise of British manufacturers. Nevertheless, improvement is possible.

Satoh Visits Blum

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, Jan. 26—With his departure for Tokyo scheduled for tomorrow, Mr. Naotake Satoh, Japanese ambassador to Paris, today paid a visit to Premier Leon Blum to bid him farewell.

What People Here Are Thinking Is Given By Writer

Man On Street Bears No Ill Will Towards Others; Great Interest Shown

You know well enough that official Japan thinks in terms of armaments and expansion, that it dreams of hegemony in Asia and the Pacific. Therefore, when you read that "seventy million pairs of greedy Japanese eyes" are said to be turned on Britain's Eastern stronghold, Singapore, on the wide plains of unfortunate China, and on the quickly developing Soviet territories in Asia—you may tend to believe it.

But is it really true that the seventy million Japanese people, that even thirty, even ten million of them, have their eyes fixed on the same objects as their Army and Navy?

For two years I have watched the Japanese man-in-the-street in order to find out. I definitely think it is Not true.

I have compared what the plain Japanese actually knows about Britain and other Western countries, and what he thinks of us. And I am struck by the commonsense of his judgment.

He does not know much about us that is good, and certainly all that is bad. For almost all his little knowledge of the West comes either from his thoroughly conceited, nationalistic Press or from our own silly, unrealistic films. Both tell him: Westerners are more or less degenerate and crooked, and their countries are really those of "the setting sun."

They are terribly wealthy, no doubt on account of their "exploitation of the colored races." And the Press will rub it in every day that the Western nations are jealous and afraid of Japan's progress and united, in spite of all that tragicomic friction among themselves, in their effort to suppress and to fight Japan.

Yet Yamamoto-san, the plain Japanese, takes a detached view.

He somehow likes the West. He is not affected by the remnants of that old Japanese inferiority complex from which many of his educated compatriots still suffer in spite of the country's great progress, and he needs no over-compensation. He thinks we are funny and perhaps a little luckier than he himself, but we are interesting and have helped rather than hindered his country to advance.

He has a certain longing for the West, says the correspondent for the News-Chronicle. And just as his politeness is not submissive, the expression of his friendly feelings towards us is certainly not propagandist.

Yamamoto-san's attitude stands out against the rudeness and the contempt of the few Japanese one meets who seem to specialize in super-patriotism; and against the propagandist pains of those who make it their business to give the foreigner "the right ideas about Japan."

Neither have I found a plain man who has shown hatred for the Soviet Union, which has to compete with Britain for the rank of Japan's official "enemy number one," or contempt for "insincere and unceoperative sister China."

I saw Japanese cinema crowds looking at a film of Moscow's May Day Parade. There was no hiss, no symptom of apprehension when the Red heavy bombers seemed to dash into that public of wood-and-paper-house dwellers who live only some 700 miles away from the Soviet air bases.

For the real feeling towards China I have the evidence of some of those tens of thousands of Chinese who live and work peacefully in Japan.

"We feel quite at home among the ordinary Japanese. They never show us that we are strangers. They don't know anything about China." They really don't. There was one who stared at me with astonishment when I talked about the fact that Japan's script, that cumbersome system of thousands of complicated characters, had been taken over wholesale, together with most of Japan's basic culture, from China.

The Japanese people are good sports. They look at the foreign world around them with curiosity and interest, not with contempt.

Whenever I have heard an apprehensive remark about foreign countries from a plain Japanese it has been an undigested quotation from the morning newspaper, and you could almost hear him putting it in quotation marks without showing much concern or inner conviction.

I watched the crowds of Japanese people lining beflagged streets when fresh troops were leaving for service in Manchuria and North China. Enthusiasm seemed to be restricted to the well-organized Young-Men's Associations, school children and relatively few of the ordinary public, and it was never as turbulent as at a big sports event.

I saw the same crowds when the ashes of some of those soldiers who die every single day in action against an undiminishable legion of Chinese "bandits" in Manchuria returned home at Tokyo Station. They just seemed depressed, receiving the ashes not of national heroes, but of beloved family members.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Mountain Sleepwalker

Little Barney Perkins, 11, of New Merkle, near Birmingham, Ala., dreamed on Saturday, July 18, 1936, at about 8 p.m. that his father had sent him to town for ice cream and some spare parts for his scooter. Three hours later a sleeping boy ran on his scooter into a curbing in Birmingham, fell and awoke six miles from his home. He had traveled in his sleep towards the city and down Red Mountain on the scooter while fast asleep. That he escaped injury during that perilous trip was a miracle.

dels of employing box girder sections, made from light pressed steel welded at the joints, for the frames. Running boards and mudguards are narrower, due to the increase in body width, and the bridges between the front guards and the bonnet have been largely eliminated. In some makes, the front seats, in addition to being provided with an adjustment for fore-and-aft movement, are also now adjustable vertically. Greater room for the legs is made possible by more generous dimensions, as well as by the removal of obstructions, such as the gear lever and hand brake in the front compartment, and the tunnel in the floor of the rear compartment.

The increase in the width and slope of wind-shields, which has become progressivelcy greater during the last few years, has been continued in some of the 1937 models, in order to emphasize the streamline effect, which now seems to be fairly well established. Additional over-all length has been achieved in some cases by actually increasing the wheelbase, while in others the same effect has been secured by locating the radiator and engine further forward. The tunnel has been eliminated, with some exceptions, despite still lower floors, the latter resulting in lower centers of gravity and consequent improvements in riding comfort and safety. Those manufacturers who have attempted any material change in front-end treatment have, for the most part, adopted a horizontally finned radiator grill. In a number of cases, a striking effect has been attained by extending the lines of the grill to the bonnet louvres. With few exceptions, the horns are concealed by the grill.

acquired from the Hermitage Gallery in Russia. It also contains Renaissance sculptures, including most of those formerly in the Dreyfuss collection in Paris; and there is, in addition, a large assemblage of American portraits from the Clarke and other collection, which would be suitable for a national portrait gallery.

By reason of the rarity and importance of these works of art, the general character of the collection is such that it will furnish the nucleus of a great national collection and will give our country at once a national gallery that will rank with the other great galleries of the world.

In making the collection, I have placed emphasis on quality rather than quantity, and the terms under which the gift would be made are intended solely for the purpose of safeguarding the collection and insuring efficient management, so that the highest standard of quality will always be maintained in the art to be displayed in the gallery.

If this plan meets with your approval, I will submit a formal offer of gift stating specifically the terms thereof and the erection of the building may proceed immediately upon the acceptance of such offer and the passage of necessary legislation by Congress. Appropriate instruments of conveyance and gift will then be executed.

Sincerely yours,
A. W. MELLON.

Ross Alexander Called A Suicide

Actor Is Found Shot On His Hollywood Estate At Peak Of Brief Film Career

The death of Ross Alexander screen actor, at Hollywood was pronounced as suicidal on January 3 by Detective Lieutenant Ray Giese.

The body of the dark-haired actor was found the night previous in a barn on the estate where he and his bride, Anno Nogel, had lived since their marriage on Sept. 16, 1936. Cornelius Stevenson, Alexander's chauffeur, who found the body, said that a pistol was clutched in the dead man's hand, according to the New York Times.

The actor's death was a tragic finale to the story of a young couple who deserted the Eastern stage to gain film fame. Mr. Alexander's first wife, Aleta Freile, shot herself to death on Dec. 6, 1935, and the actor said that she had been depressed because she could not get film roles and because her professional progress did not keep pace with his.

Detective Giese said that he was informed the actor had never shaken off his despondency over the death of his first wife. The chauffeur told him that on last Dec. 6, on the anniversary of her death, he struggled with the actor for possession of cartridges for the pistol found last night.

Stevenson told police that his master left the house about 7 o'clock with his pistol, announcing that he was going to kill a duck. Stevenson's wife, a maid, took up the narrative.

"He met the hired man, who had already killed it, and returned," said Elta Stevenson. "Then he went out again and told Cornelius to call him from the barn when dinner was ready. When Cornelius did, he found the body, the pistol and a lighted torch beside it."

Miss Nagel, a young and pretty film actress, sat in the house knitting after her husband walked out into the night. She became hysterical when Stevenson reported what he had found.

Death came to Mr. Alexander at the peak of his brief cinema career. He had just completed a musical picture in which he appeared in the male lead opposite Ruby Keeler.

Collegiate Body Joins With Baseball Congress

NEW YORK, Dec. 30—The National Collegiate Athletic Association adopted a resolution at its convention yesterday under which it will join hands with the U. S. A. Baseball Congress in governing amateur baseball throughout the country.

The action paves the way for the organizations to act on uniform rules for the amateur game and to cooperate in selection of the annual "All-America team" and the quadrennial Olympic baseball team.

The resolution was voted after the U. S. A. Baseball Congress, through its executive vice-president, Leslie Mann, submitted to the N. C. A. A. a request for that organization to "endorse, approve and cooperate" in establishing the Olympic and All-America teams and to "join hands with the U. S. A. Baseball Congress in establishing, operating and enforcing" amateur eligibility rulings.

The request asked the N. C. A. A. to appoint a committee to study, with the baseball congress, the drafting of an "accepted ruling" governing amateur baseball and player eligibility.

France Adopts New Policy For African Colonies

Important Changes Made To Bring Colonies And Mandates Closer Together

A recent decree of the French Government, laying down that the post of Commissioner of the French sphere of Togoland is henceforth to be combined with that of the Governor-General of French West Africa, brings about an important change in the status of the Mandated Territory. In adopting a policy of closer rapprochement between their Colonies and Mandates, the French are only following a course similar to that already undertaken by successive British Governments.

From an economic standpoint the decision, on the final distribution of the former German Colonies, to administer the British spheres of Togoland and the Cameroons as divisions of the Gold Coast and Nigeria respectively was sound, says the Times, London. The areas of the two British Mandates (13,000 square miles of Togoland, 34,000 square miles of the Cameroons) are small in comparison with those of the adjacent Colonies (Gold Coast 92,000 square miles, Nigeria 39,000 square miles); to have regarded the territories as independent entities would have increased greatly their cost of maintenance, and deprived them of many of the advantages which their attachment to the larger Colonies now enables them to enjoy.

French Colonial officials have been known to remark that such a step clearly indicated the intention of Great Britain henceforth to consider the territories as a part of the British Empire. France, it has been pointed out, although her share of West African Mandates was limited to some 21,000 square miles of Togoland and 166,000 square miles of the Cameroons, at once set up separate administrations, thus proving that she regarded them as quite distinct from her Colonies. On the other hand criticism has not been wanting that the appointment of two Commissaires de la République, with their attendant staffs, was largely an excuse for finding employment for as many officials as possible.

Complaint From Togoland

French Togoland was originally created an independent Mandate under a Commissioner in 1921, and so remained almost divorced from the rest of French West Africa, until 1934. In that year, when the financial crisis necessitated severe economy, the opportunity was taken to effect a closer liaison with the Federation of French West Africa. The post of indivdiual Commissioner of French Togoland was abolished, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Dahomey nominated to combine the duties with his own. Certain Government Departments in the two territories were amalgamated and a senior Administrator was appointed to act as the Commissioner's Deputy in French Togoland. The disadvantages of this arrangement quickly became apparent.

After having been for so long independent the population of French Togoland, both European and African, objected very strongly to being considered, however indirectly, as under the control of a neighboring Colony, and complaints were soon forthcoming that the interests of the territory were being subordinated to those of Dahomey. Although the Mandate retained its virtual independence and was thus precluded from any share in the many resources of French West Africa, the territory was yet under the supreme control of a subordinate official of the Federation.

Under the new decree steps will be taken for French Togoland to conserve its own Budget and, in addition, various special regulations rendered obligatory by the terms of the Mandate, but the Administrator-in-Charge will receive his instructions direct from the Governor-General of French West Africa in the latter's capacity as Commissioner. A large interchange of personnel between French Togoland and the Federation is envisaged, enabling the former to benefit from the services of the highly specialized Departments of the Government of French West Africa. Finally, the general coordination of policy and ideas will mean an important saving in the cost of administration.

In many quarters attention has often been directed to the advantages of a closer relationship between the four British West African Colonies, and the appointment of a Governor-General of the whole has repeatedly been advocated. The avowed French policy in Africa has always been one of consolidation, and although this absorption of the French sphere of Togoland into the Federation of French West Africa can only prove of immense benefit to the Mandated Territory, it is at the same time a further step towards the desired end.

Schumann-Heink Last Of Her School Of Singers

And maybe, if some one would ask me, I would do it again!" Her irrepressible vigor and invincible humanity would have brought her through anything.

Her geniality and the rapidly wagging tongue of the days of success might blind a casual acquaintance to what lay underneath, and the nature of her achievement. She had paid in every conceivable coin but that of a loss of principle for her achievement. (Once she said with a grin that perhaps it was good for her that her lack of looks avoided temptations which might have been enjoyable!) She had boundless energy. She trouped all over America and in fact everywhere, even to Japan, where she could go and sing.

She sang in the great capitals and she sang in the Arizona desert amid Mexicans, Chinese, a few Americans and innumerable insects. She sang at Chautauquas and in the heat of the Summer and helped mothers who had come long distances with their babies to hear her. She knew everybody and was hail-fellow-well-met, but was fully sagacious enough, when extended the cordial hospitality of royalty, to keep her distance and to make the very low bows which were appreciated at the courts. There is no gainsaying the fact that she was shrewd and wily, and that, although an impulsive, exuberant and imaginative temperament would lead her to discuss the most magnificent projects and the most daring and chivalric enterprises, the very sober sense and the very clear judgment that had developed in her would usually intervene in time to save her, and shatter the dreams of her erstwhile bedazzled conferees!

But it was all in the cause, like some of the more obvious songs she put on her programs. They, in combination with the preponderance of great music which she invariably offered, brought home the bacon! And she had many mouths to feed. There were those who fastened upon her like leeches, doing what most human beings do when they discover one individual in their midst with a heart and a potential pocketbook. They sat down upon her, and she, who could be extremely hard if not sharp in a bargain, was fairly milked by them, and often deeply hurt by unworthiness and ingratitude. But she could always laugh, while, as an artist, she never sang a song which had not something in it, and often conferred upon a commonplace passage a significance which must have astonished the composer.

The biographical facts of her career are well known and they need no recapitulation. It is to be said that her head never was turned either by the scanty early measure of recognition the young artist received in Germany or by her overwhelming success when she made her first American appearances in grand opera in Chicago and New York. She kept her head, she worked unremittingly.

More than most, she had to. Those intimately acquainted with the physical problems of song know her difficulties. It was a heavy voice and there were marked differences between the registers. It was a problem to equalize them as much as might be, to learn to pass readily and smoothly from one register to another—a question, of course, with all singers, but with her one of exceptional difficulty—and to make the most of the distinctive coloring of the different parts of the voice.

Near Enough

A client was being shown round an antique shop by a new assistant, the proprietor being out.

"This chair," said the youth importantly, pausing before an old piece of furniture, "belongs to the period of Louis Cross-Eye."

The prospective customer looked puzzled. "Louis Cross-Eye," he repeated. "I've never heard of such a person."

"Well, that's how the label describes it," said the assistant; and he handed him a card bearing the words "Period of Louis XI."

Bright Future For Democracy In World

fore the advance of business revival.

That is why it no longer seems necessary, in dealing with the outlook for democracy, to present a statistical survey of the problem, measuring the world's areas under freedom and the areas under bondage, and noting how much has been lost or gained since survey.

Two or three years ago, when the night was darkest and the storm howled loudest, the foundations of our belief were shaking under our feet. It was not a mere question of Austria slipping over to fascism or Northern Spain staging a Red revolt. These were changes of terrain which did not greatly affect the strategic situation. But when voices arose in the United States, Great Britain and France to predict the doom of the democratic - capitalist partnership, we could scarcely blame frightened men for thinking that the home front was giving way. Even sober men had to take a firm hold on themselves against the onrush of panic.

Changing Opinions

We have emerged from that apocalyptic era and state of mind. People always see signs in the skies when times are bitter hard. They hear voices prophesying doom, and see the rolling up of old scrolls and the unfolding of new ones.

But when business gets better the end of the world recedes into the further distance. The breakdown of institutions is found to be less catastrophic than stated. Philosophies of despair born out of the special occasion fade before the surge of returning health.

As business picks up we hear less of the exhaustion of Opportunity in America and the vanished Frontier. We get around to thinking that there may still be a good deal of ceiling left to American life. We hear less about the monster Technology which breeds unemployment and starvation, and we hark back to a saner view of the machine as the liberator of the toiling masses of mankind, if wisely used, to be sure. We hear fewer people say they would gladly exchange political freedom for economic security, it was reported to the New York Times. Political freedom has shown itself capable of repairing economic damage.

There is another reason why people in the free countries speak less glibly of giving up freedom in exchange for economic betterment. On the one hand, we are discovering that freedom may after all be compatible with economic health. On the other hand, we look abroad at the enslaved nations and we are not at all sure that unfreedom is a guarantee of economic well-being.

There is turmoil in a democracy when the people are hungry, because the people are free to cry out. In the dragooned nations the people cannot cry out. They must not only tighten their belts but must do it in silence. At the depth of the depression we could not humanly blame frightened people in the free countries if they looked abroad and thought that things were better under Mussolini, Hitler, Stalin. Well, there is not much room for illusion today concerning how well people are faring under Mussolini, Hitler, Stalin. They are not doing things better over there.

Changing Conditions

Thus the old democratic home, after a second glance, begins to look a lot better than we thought, by comparison with some other places one might mention, and after a hearty breakfast. About two years ago, I made a point about the recent Hitler purge in Germany and the Dollfuss murder in Vienna, which may be worth repeating today.

It seemed to me then that such hideous outbursts of primal savagery must give pause to the eager spirits in our democracies. They were tired of shabby and cowardly compromises, as they called them. They were learning to admire the swift, decisive stroke, the cleansing action, as some loved to call it. Well, there it was before them, the decisive action of wholesale blood baths, the flashing sword blade of assassination. Upon further inspection these things did not look so pretty, after all.

Since I last wrote in this vein we have lived through two more years of education in the pretty ways of absolutism and violence; and our shabby, cowardly democratic compromises and timidities show up better and better against Nazi warbrewings and Ethiopian triumphs, and Soviet treason trials and Spanish class wars.

Experiments Continue

We have definitely emerged, in the democratic countries, from the apocalyptic state of mind, from the doom psychology. We have grown tired of Ultimate Principles contending for control of human destiny, the Red revelation against the Fascist revelation. We have won back to faith in the jog trot experiments and compromises of the democratic method. People like to speak of old worlds dying and new worlds being born in agony. It is better to speak of old worlds fading out and new worlds succeeding them under the free, democratic, gradualist method.

That, at least, is the method in which the great democracies of the world have lately reaffirmed their faith. Here at home the Roosevelt election is a sweep away from Rightists and Leftists to our traditional American populistic centrism. In the French democracy a coalition Socialist Premier has firmly declared against Leftist experimentation beyond the limits of his democratic mandate. Great Britain's recent constitutional crisis brought forth a universal restatement of the democratic creed.

Bourgeois intellectualists might be attracted by the picture of a "strong" democratic English King. But the British democracy, down to the most violent of Glasgow Leftists, refused to have any truck with strong leaders in this age of too many strong men.

In the depth of the depression the world was in a mood for desperate remedies. Nations bartered their souls for the promise of bread. But today we know that the free peoples are the better-fed peoples. The others have bartered their souls for half rations.

Cummings Seeks To Speed Justice In U.S.

revolvers and pistols.

"The honest and law-abiding citizen is caused no greater hardship or burden by such a regulation than by the requirement that he register his automobile, while the system of registering pistols and revolvers will place a potent weapon against crime in the hands of law-enforcement officers.

"I have the honor to renew the above recommendation. In my opinion, the supervision of the sale and distribution of revolvers and pistols is essential in the work of the suppression of crime."

Besides the figures already given, Mr. Hoover said that three persons convicted in kidnapping cases were awaiting sentence; three persons committed suicide; six were murdered; five were killed resisting arrest with firearms, and two had been lynched.

At the end of the fiscal year fifteen persons were in custody awaiting disposition of kidnapping charges against them.

"During the past ear thirty-one convictions of violators of the Federal kidnapping statute were obtained as a result of investigations conducted by the bureau," Mr. Hoover stated. "These convictions resulted in the imposition of the following sentences: Four life, 339 years and 6 months actual imprisonment, 1 year suspended, and 4 years and 6 months probationary.

"Included in the bureau's accomplishments in the field of kidnapping investigations during the year were the apprehension of Alvin Karpis, Harry Campbell, William Dainard, commonly known by the alias Mahan, and Thomas H. Robinson Jr. in the brief period of eleven days from May 1 to May 11, 1936. Karpis, Campbell and Robinson were subsequently sentenced in Federal courts to life imprisonment for kidnapping, and William Dainard received a sixty-year sentence for the same offense."

Free Press Called A Public Heritage

Sulzberger Declares Publishers Are Responsible To People For Integrity Of News

Freedom of the press is not the privilege of the newspaper publisher, it is his responsibility, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, publisher of The New York Times, told members of the Columbia University Alumni Association recently at their twenty-eighth annual holiday luncheon, held at the Columbia University Club, 4 West Forty-third Street, New York City, according to the New York Times.

Recalling that the 150th anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution is at hand, Mr. Sulzberger said:

"Who could ask for a better setting in which to frame for ourselves and our children the blessings of our Bill of Rights than the somber curtains which now drape so much of the balance of the world, a world engaged in war and in preparation for war, a world steeped in intolerance and bigotry?

"Every instructor, it seems to me, might each day teach these words diligently to his children and every citizen write them upon the doorposts of his house and upon his gate:

"'The Bill of Rights assures us freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly. These fundamental freedoms are the cornerstones that support, four square, the edifice of liberty we enjoy—if one crumbles, the others fall.'

Fighting People's Battle

"That is our sacred heritage, which as citizens we must constantly struggle to preserve. Freedom of the press, no less than any of the other three freedoms, is your right as citizens. It is not something designed to help me as a publisher in my business. It is not my privilege but my responsibility. And when the publisher fights to preserve that freedom he is only engaging in an advance-guard action into which you must be called if he is not successful."

Mr. Sulzberger, discussing censorship in all its forms, rejected as untrue the theory that the press had lost its influence. The figures often cited are that 80 to 85 per cent of the press opposed President Roosevelt's re-election, he remarked, and they are used to support the contention that newspapers' influence is gone.

It was the day-by-day story of the activities of the New Deal, reported by the newspapers, that shaped the opinion of the peoples and when some newspapers let editorial opinion seep into their news columns at the start of the campaign, it was too late, Mr. Sulzberger declared.

"The significance of the press to you as citizens is that it brings to you daily as clear and as accurate a report as possible of what is taking place throughout the world," he continued. "Only with this news at hand can you be possessed of the information with which to protect your other fundamental freedoms and thus secure 'the blessings of liberty' for yourselves and your posterity."

Examples of Poor Policy

Mr. Sulzberger cited, as an example of government censorship of news, the formal notice sent to British editors by the Admiralty, asking them to ignore the sending of the British Home Fleet into the Mediterranean to bluff Mussolini out of his Ethiopian adventure.

"Suppression in Great Britain was presumably justified on the ground that it was desired to escape arousing needless public alarm," he declared. "But if one of the newly arrived British ships had been damaged by a mine or a torpedo—a piece of news impossible to suppress in peace time—what would have been the reaction of the unprepared public, a public unaware until that time that its prize warships were in the Mediterranean?"

Mr. Sulzberger mentioned the "voluntary" censorship of the British press in the Simpson divorce case as an instance where censorship had defeated its own ends.

As far as the European continent is concerned, censorship has long exceeded all bounds, Mr. Sulzberger declared, pointing out that in Germany it is high treason to communicate to a foreigner information withheld from the German press by the authorities, and that penalties in other countries are so severe that sheer fear of consequences keeps news out of the papers.

Another type of censorship comes from pressure groups and persons interested in particular causes. Speaking of the pressure groups, he said:

"In these days they are quite likely to be either Communists or Fascists, labor or religious groups; and however much they may differ in doctrine, they are quite comparable in their ability to raise a racket. You all know how they operate. They perform similiarly in Washington, with floods of wires and letters to swamp hesitating Congressmen. We, too, receive such communications on occasion, threatening boycott instead."

Miss Virginia Clive, niece of the British Ambassador and Lady Clive, returned to Tokyo today on the Empress of Canada from a visit to Peiping and Nanking where she was the guest of the British Ambassador and Lady Knatchbull-Hugessen for several weeks.

ELECTED DIRECTOR

Mr. John Gadsby was elected a director of the Nippon Kokusan Kogyo Kabushiki Kaisha, the Japanese subsidiary of Corn Products Refining Company, New York, at a general meeting of the shareholders Friday. The others are Mr. Kenkichi Kagami, Mr. Ichiro Hattori and Mr. Y. Nakatani, all of Mitsubishi interests. Mr. Kagami is president of the company and Mr. Nakatani is managing director.

FAREWELL BUFFET

Mrs. James P. Robinson entertained at a buffet dinner Saturday in honor of Mrs. Joseph Hanley who will leave Japan on the Chichibu Maru Friday, February 12 for Los Angeles. The buffet dinner was served in southern style and the center of the table was decorated with a duplicate of the Chichibu Maru. The dinner was followed by dancing later in the evening. About 20 guests were present many of them being from the motion picture circles as Mr. Hanley is connected with Warner Brothers.

INSPECTION MISSION LEAVES

The Osaka exporters Society organized an inspection mission for America recently to inspect the commercial and economic situation in the United States. The mission left Osaka for Yokohama Wednesday January 27 and sailed for San Francisco on board the N.Y.K. Liner Taiyo Maru on last Tuesday January 28. The members of the mission are Mr. Teiji Okuno, Mr. Shinzo Miyachi and Mr. Katsuji Yamashita. They will visit San Francisco, Los Angeles, Huston, New Orleans, Saint Louis, Washington, New York, Chicago, Seattle and several other cities. The mission took some 10,000 Japanese gold fishes and various samples of Japanese products with them, with which they will hold exhibitions at certain principal cities. Their stay in America will be for about three months.

TO HOLD ONE-MAN SHOW

Mr. Kakuo Hayashi, oil painter is holding a one-man show of his recent works at the Nippon Kogyo Club, Marunouchi, Tokyo from today till Friday, February 5. Admission is free.

CELEBRATION PARTY

A celebration party will be held in honor of Messrs. Tsuguharu Foujita, Koji Tanabe and Teiji Okanobori by the Paris Society at the Marble Restaurant at 5 p.m. Thursday February 4.

Mr. Foujita has recently written "Bras Immpon" and Mr. Tanabe published "From Paris to Katsushika." Mr. Okanobori has written "Outline of Japanese Art." The three authors of the new books will be honored by their friends at the party.

LADIES' NIGHT AT AMERICAN CLUB

The women members of the American Club and their friends are holding a Ladies' Night at the Club Wednesday, February 10. Dinner will be served at 7 p.m. and will be followed by bridge and mahjong. Mrs. R. F. Moss, chairman of the women's social committee, is receiving reservations. A stag dinner has also been arranged for that night.

LEAVES FOR FORMOSA

Mr. W. J. Davies, acting British counsellor, has left Tokyo for a short trip to Formosa.

TO SPEAK AT WOMEN'S CLUBS

Mrs. Sally Dickason, fashion advisor to Bonwit Teller of New York City, will arrive in Yokohama by the Hiye Maru Friday, February 5 with her husband Mr. Deane Dickason, head of the Far Harbours Tours. Mrs. Dickason spoke to the Tokyo Women's Club last year and will again address the Club members at a meeting on Monday, February 8. She is scheduled to address the International Women's Club of Yokohama also, probably on Tuesday, February 9. The original date for Yokohama was February 5 but has been postponed due to the delay of the Hiye Maru.

Sally Dickason, though not yet 30, is, perhaps, the foremost arbiter of travel fashions anywhere in the world today. She has circled the globe ten times since she married Deane H. Dickason, the eminent travel lecturer, in 1929 and is returning to Japan on her eleventh circumnavigation on February 5th. She has been affiliated with Bonwit Teller, the exclusive New York women's shop, in an executive capacity for the last three years. Bonwit Teller, the only Fifth Avenue store with a woman president, now alludes to and sends Mrs. Dickason to all parts of the world as its "Ambassaddress of Fashion". This year Mrs. Dickason is bringing a number of the newest and most attractive outfits for Spring wear:— dresses, ensembles, coats, and beach costumes. A new feature is the inclusion of clothes for larger, older women, in response to an insistent demand. Not only will Mrs. Dickason be pleased to talk with her friends while here, but she is always happy to shop for them when she returns to New York. Many women send her their photographs with descriptions of the kind of clothes they like, and with these aids she can shop with a really good idea of just what they want. Mrs. Dickason has republished recently her two invaluable manuals for feminine travellers— "Your Travel Wardrobe: What to Wear Everywhere"; and "Sally's Little Green Book: A Shopper's Round-the-World-Guide".

RETURN ON EMPRESS OF CANADA

Dr. Frank Is Ousted As Head Of Winsconsin U.

Follette encouraged his appointees on the board to oust Dr. Frank but had even discussed possible successors with them some months ago.

Dr. Frank declared, however, that if the university which he heads had suffered in any respect during his administration, it was the result of curtailment of appropriations under Governor La Follette's administrations. While he declined to enter into "dialectic shadow boxing" with those who charged him with "juggling figures" to paint a rosy picture of Wisconsin's academic rating, he denied this accusation vigorously.

Unfair Procedure Charged

Angrily, the university president protested from time to time that the procedure laid down by Mr. Wilkie, president of the board and leader of the fight against him, was unfair. First, said Dr. Frank, he had been forced to proceed with his defense before he was ready, and then was informed that after he had finished his defense his attackers would have a final inning.

The moment he had finished the counter-barrage began, with Mr. Gates leading off for the "prosecution" and Mr. Hones standing by to read a paper accusing Dr. Frank of injecting the only note of politics into the deliberations of the board. Dr. Frank had previously accused board members of politics. When the rebuttal began the hearing had been in session eleven hours and the majority seemed determined to wind up the entire matter in this sitting if it took all night.

The second day's session was marked in the morning by wrangling among members of the board, by appeals from alumni to the regents to keep Wisconsin free of political domination, and by an early evening debate between two students who disagreed on whether the undergraduates wished to keep their "prexy" or toss him to the wolves.

Don Truaz, who started a petition against Dr. Frank's removal and obtained 1,200 signatures from among the 10,000 enrolled students, told the regents that the "students demand that you keep Dr. Frank."

Another Student Is Critical

He had hardly subsided before another boy orator, Jim Doyle, president of the senior class, arose and expressed a different view. He said Truax took too much for granted in undertaking to speak for the student body; that many students questioned the oft-repeated assertion that the movement against Dr. Frank was purely political.

There was a belief among many students, Doyle declared, that the Alumni Association, which is defending Dr. Frank, was serving "as a smoke screen for the Republican party."

At 7:40 p.m. the regents recessed until 9, after a wrangle over whether they should dispose of Dr. Frank in the privacy of an executive session or in public.

Following a defense of Dr. Frank by the Rev. E. M. Christopherson of Pigeon Falls, a member of the board, Robert V. Baker Jr. of Kenosha moved for a closed session. He is generally regarded as the one member of the anti-Frank bloc who comes closest to being on the fence.

The pro-Frank regents, who have been outvoted on every issue that has arisen, immediately resorted to tactics of desperation, rising to announce that they would refuse to be bound by star chamber methods and asserting that they would give out on what happened in the meeting the minute it adjourned. They made such a hullabaloo that Mr. Wilkie decided to let the matter rest until the weary board members had refreshed themselves with food and drink.

As on the first day of the hearing, today's session was held in the small anteroom of the president's office, where, in the name of dignity, the regents insisted on sitting so that none could charge them with turning their proceeding into a "Roman holiday."

The local fire department and health board showed concern about conditions there today, but the regents went right on. Students and alumni were jammed in so tightly that even the regents had spectators leaning on their shoulders.

Photographers' flashlight bulbs flared in speakers' faces, while cheers and boos interrupted the proceedings, with no word of protest from any one. Students going to and from classes stopped to peer in through windows along the corridor, and at one point a dozen of them tumbled head first into the room through a window they had pried open.

Students Gibe at Regents

When the afternoon session opened after a brief noontime recess, several hundred students were lined up in the corridor singing "The Varsity Toast" and gibing the Regents for being tardy in getting started.

The La-Follette-appointed Regents, who have been voting as a unit on almost every minor issue arising in the hearing, came in for a considerable ribbing from Dr. Frank and his defenders, who lost no opportunity to intersperse in their speeches remarks to the general effect that for all the good their speeches would do they might as well save their breath.

Mr. Grady, who made the most extended plea for Dr. Frank, caused a sensation by the manner in which he sought to pin on Governor La Follette the responsibility for the move to get rid of Dr. Frank.

He recalled that with Mr. Wilkie and John Callahan, Superintendent of Education, he had gone to the Governor's office in response to the later's invitation. He had always in the past accepted such invitations, was always ready to consult with the Chief Executive, and never thought he would be told what to do, he declared.

Mr. Grady said that at the conference Mr. Wilkie spoke as if Dr. Frank's ouster were a foregone conclusion if the president did not resign, and Mr. Grady asserted this was news to him because as far as he knew no canvass of votes had been made.

At this point Mr. Grady turned to Mr. Wilkie, who was busy with some papers, and demanded to know whether the chairman recalled that in the Governor's office he, Mr. Grady, had asked how Mr. Gates stood on the matter.

Mr. Wilkie could not recall any such inquiry.

"Well, maybe you recall the reply that the Governor made," pressed Mr. Grady.

"I remember neither the question nor any such reply," said Mr Wilkie.

Mr. Grady then drew from his pocket a slip of paper which he said contained four names and showed it to Mr. Wilkie, demanding to know whether the paper did not contain a list of the four men from among whom Governor La Follette said the regents might pick a successor to Dr. Frank. Mr. Wilkie said the whole matter was a mystery to him. He could not recall that anything was said about a successor.

Mr. Grady then tried his memory test on Mr. Callahan with better success. Mr. Callahan remembered clearly that all four men were discussed.

The list was not included in the record and was not made public, but it was reported that one of the names upon it was that of Dr. Robert Maynard Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago. The other three, all members of the Wisconsin faculty, were Edward B. Freed, dean of the Graduate School; Professor John M. Gaus of the Political Science Department, and Lloyd K. Garrison, dean of the Law School and former chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

Girl Defends Frank

The hearing opened soon after 8:30 a.m. with Mr. Haight and other alumni pleading with the regents to decide the case on its merits according to their own consciences.

Caryl Morse, last year's senior president, pleaded for Dr. Frank's retention on the ground that he had been a good president, always ready to listen to the problems of students and address their gatherings. His speech-making trips away from the campus, she declared, never interfered with his duties here.

In the afternoon Dr. Frank began the second and closing phase of his defense to the twofold attack on his personal qualifications for his job and his competence to administer the affairs of a great university. Today's defense consisted of a justification of his regime at Wisconsin, backed up with charts, graphs and the testimony of his deans that Wisconsin's academic standing today was as high as if not higher than it ever was.

The young-looking president, with eyes that were bloodshot and red-rimmed from sleeplessness—he has been working far into the night on his defense for the last five days—addressed a stony-faced ring of regents fidgeting in their places and often consulting their watches. He would not attempt, he said, to go into great technical detail but would merely outline his educational philosophy.

Dr. Frank said that the word "slipping" appeared to be a "favorite in the Wisconsin vocabulary." It has been applied to the university before he came to Madison in 1925 by the late John Kronshage, former president of the board of regents. The president quoted from a newspaper article by Mr. Kronshage beginning:

"The University of Wisconsin has been slipping. It is still slipping and I want the people of the State to know it."

Difference in Objectives

Dr. Frank remarked:

"That was Kronshage speaking in 1924 but it sounds like Clough Gates speaking in 1936. The difference is that the Kronshage statement was no part of a campaign to get some one and he went on further and placed the blame, honestly where it belonged, on insufficient financing."

Legislative appropriations for the university, said Dr. Frank, rose steadily from 1924. He produced a large chart, which helpers had difficulty moving into the crowded room, and pointed out that the only drop in the curve of appropriations came in "the two administrations that fell within the depression."

Governor La Follette, the executive pointed out, had been Governor in those two terms and had made cuts which the Legislature partly restored.

Three days after his election to the presidency of the university by the regents, Dr. Frank said, he learned by letters and telegrams and telephone messages something about the situation he would find in Wisconsin.

He was informed that important forces in the State wanted "a president who walked softly but who carried a big stick." His use of the word Fascist fell with electrifying effect upon the dozing regents, but there was no protest at its employment.

Dr. Frank said he was informed that there was a "lot of deadwood" to be cleared away and that a definite firing program had been outlined. He though the time to meet that situation was immediately, he went on, so the first thing he did upon arriving in Madison was to issue a statement announcing himself as "exactly the opposite type of administrator."

Other universities had tried to get presidents to "do all their thinking for them" and the result had always been an "intellectual decline," the president asserted further.

Choice of Deans Upheld

Dr. Frank said he conceived it to be the function of a university president to select and recommend the appointment of great deans. Asserting that the deans at Wisconsin were among the greatest in America, the president reminded the regents that he had selected six out of the eight now on the staff.

As to charges of Mr. Gates that the graduate schools and research had been allowed to expand under him at the expense of the undergraduate colleges, Dr. Frank denied that such had been the case, asserting that "things can't be so rotten in Denmark when we have the greatest undergraduate enrollment in our history."

At the same time he insisted that the graduate schools had held their own and denied that he had been so silly as to imply that because Wisconsin had more graduate courses than Harvard it was a better university.

He defended that dropping of the experimental college which he established here under Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, who was ousted as president of Amherst. It was an attempt to find out what results could be obtained by "integrating studies," informalizing of teaching, and "socializing the student body in the sense of developing in them a community spirit."

The experiment was never intended as a permanent fixture, Dr. Frank said, declaring that the one practical lesson it taught could not be effected because of the failure of the Legislature to vote appropriations for dormitories where students could live under conditions similar to the house system at Harvard.

Letters Kept Out of Record

Just before Dr. Frank began his discussion of education, his friends on the board tried vainly to read into the record the hundreds of communications they had received from all parts of the country protesting against the tactics of those aligned against him. The opposition rallied its forces against this move, however, declaring that most of the members of the board had studied the letters and that they were "one-sided."

While the letters were barred from the record, Mr. Wilkie consented to release them to the press. Mimeographed, they made a stack of more than thirty-five pages.

Mr. Hones, who is president of the Wisconsin Farmers Equity Union, was among those who most bitterly opposed permitting of the letters to go into the record. At the evening session he accused Mr. Frank of breaking faith with the regents to strengthen his own political fences. Turning upon the president, Mr. Hones said:

"President Frank, through your own personal political tactics you have violated every principle and pledge that you, requested of the Regents. You were the one that requested that this stuation be kept from an open heading. You were the one that did not want to have this brought before the board and agreed that you would not put up a fight if proper time were given you to locate other activities.

"We kept our pledge, but you used our confidence the last six months to build up your political fences, State and national, which has created unjustified bitter animosities. You have known for some time that there has been serious discord in this university, and I have failed to see at any time where you have tried to settle these differences for the purpose of creating harmony for the good of the university.

"The accusations of politics have been entirely due to your own wishes, actions and activities."

'Mr. Deeds' Chosen Best Film Of 1936

Huston still ahead with eight, Mr. Tracy next with six and Mr. Cooper with four. On the fifth, Mr. Huston had the required two-thirds vote with twelve to Mr. Tracy's six.

The most protracted contest was that for the year's best direction. On the first ballot Fritz Lang received six votes for "Fury," William Wyled (of "These Three' and "Dodsworth") got five, Mr. Mamoulian four and George Cukor ("Romeo and Juliet") and Frank Capra ("Mr. Deeds") one each.

Mamoulian the Winner

On the second Mr. Mamoulian had seven Mr. Lang six and Mr. Wyler four. The next seven ballots seesawed between Mr. Mamoulian and Mr. Lang and finally, after considerable discussion of the directors' respective contributions to their films, the vote went: Mr. Mamoulian twelve, Mr. Lang six.

The medals and scrolls, acknowledging the winners' contributions to the 1936 cinema, will be presented by the critics at a reception at the Waldorf-Astoria on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 24. The ceremonies, with New York and Hollywood linked by radio, will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting Company with Richard Watts Jr., who left the ranks of the film critics to succeed the late Percy Hammond as dramatic critic of The New York Herald Tribune, as master of ceremonies.

Among the New York newspaper reviewers who voted were Kate Mameron and Wanda Hale of The Daily News, William Boehnel of The World Telegram, Bland Johanesen of The Mirror, Regina Crewe and Robert Garland of The New York American, Howard Barnes and Marguerite Tazelaar of The Herald Tribune, Irene Thirer and Archer Winsten of The Post, Rose Pelswick of The Journal, Leo Mishkin of The Morning Telegraph, Dorothy Gates of The Daily Worker, Winston Burdett of The Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Seymour Roman of The Brooklyn Time Union, Edward Price of The Brooklyn Citizen and Frank S. Nugent and John T. McManus of The New York Times.

front springs; double-acting shock absorbers front and single acting rear, as compared with single acting front and rear; worm and roller sector steering, 17½ to 1 ratio, instead of worm and straddle-mounted sector, 16 to 1 ratio. In the De Luxe Town Sedan and Coach (2-door model) the front seat has a full width cushion and divided back, while in the Master model, both the seat cushion and back are divided.

One of the important refinements in the Master series, resulting in a degree of steering ease entirely new in conventionally-sprung cars is a new shock-absorbing drag-link in the steering mechanism. This link is essentially a "floating" member, and ball-and-socket at either end being spring-cushioned on both sides. It operates to absorb practically all road impacts before they can reach the steering wheel, thus making an important contribution to safety and to driving ease.

Exclusive features of the Master De Luxe include rubber pads on clutch and brake pedals, instrument panel ash receiver, concealed roller curtain at rear window, stainless steel moulding on the running boards, bumper guards front and rear, metal covers on the rear springs. The De Luxe Town Sedan and Coach have additional ash receivers in both seat arm rests; the Sport Sedan and Sedan have ash receivers in the back of the front seat.

Mexican Chamber Votes Bill To Protect Relics

MEXICO CITY.—A bill to protect the artistic and historic treasures of Mexico has been passed by the Chamber of Deputies. Its object is to prevent the exportation of the archeological riches which for decades have been taken from the country.

Mexico's archeological zones are centered around the cities of Chichen Itza and Uxmal, in the Yucatan peninsula, which contain the finest relics of the ancient Mayan civilization, about Monte Alban and Mitla, in the state of Oaxaca where remnants of the Zapotec-Mixtec cultures are found, and in and near Mexico City where Aztec and Toltec ruins are abundant.

These spots have for years been the hunting grounds for collectors, both scientific and amateur, who have succeeded in uncovering and transporting priceless relics of the great Indian civilizations existing before the Spanish Conquest. The treasures taken from these spots have gone to the museums of the world, in New York, Boston, London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna.

The apathy of the Mexican government in failing to check these inroads on the national treasures has been the subject of frequent attacks and the new bill is designed to end all future exportations of Mexico's scientific and cultural treasures. It is written not only to protect the archeological remains, but books and manuscripts as well.

Currency Plan Splits Alberta Credit Party

Court Action Foreseen If Move To Issue Money Is Approved By Legislature

EDMONTON, Alta., Jan. 2—A show-down between left and right wings of the Social Credit party in Alberta threatens to disrupt the united front which Premier William Aberhart's government so far has been able to turn to the world, and incidentally to fling the whole question of provincial constitutional rights into the political ring in the Dominion.

Since December 18 a committee to plan social credit legislation for the coming session of the Legislature in February has been holdng meetings and consulting with John Hargraves, Social Credit Green Shirt chief, of London, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. One of the members of Legislature for Leduc and general secretary of the Alberta Social Credit League, at a divisional convention declared that drastic legislation was in preparation that would "knock the opponents of social credit off their pedestals."

New Board Planned

Another member of the Legislature, J. H. Unwin, of Edson, declared that a provincial board was being considered to deal with exports and imports, and W. Kuhl, M.P., for the Federal riding of Jasper-Edson, insisted at the same convention that the issuance of debt-free currency was the only solution of the problem of success for social credit.

John Hargraves, the London Crediter, in an interview admitted he had been meeting as technical adviser with a committee of Cabinet members to prepare a plan to submit to Premier Aberhart when he returns Monday to Edmonton from his holiday in Vancouver.

Members of the government were disturbed by the statements of these speakers and some of them denied any knowledge of a committee named by the Premier to study a plan for social credit. Dr. W. W. Cross, Minister of Health, who was reported to have acted as chairman of the committee, issued a statement that neither Ansley, nor Unwin had any authority to speak on policy matters for the committee or for the government.

In a long-distance conversation last Thursday from Vancouver, Premier Aberhart declared legislation of a drastic nature is not to be submitted to the legislature.

Currency Problem Discussed

"I have no knowledge of any legislation of a drastic kind being planned for the coming session," he said.

But he admitted a committee had been named by him, and that he would consider a report it would make on his return to Edmonton.

Details of the plan that has been formulated by the committee cannot be learned fully, but it is understood to be based 100 per cent on the Douglas social credit plan, with eleven major principles, including payment of dividends to citizens, a compensating price discount to merchants and wholesalers, and a debt-free medium of exchange to supersede the legal currency issued by the banks and the Dominion.

At the recent convention Unwin declared this medium of exchange should be made the legal currency within the province and all other mediums be made illegal. It is pointed out that such a step as issuing currency would involve a clear-cut secession of Alberta from the Dominion Confederation.

Credit Control an Issue

Left wing Social Crediters for some time have been claiming that the autonomy of the provinces was left inviolate by both the British North American act and the later Westminster act, passed by the British Parliament. Authorities in Ottawa, it is said, have admitted that the provinces have complete automony over their own credit, and the frantic efforts of the present Dominion administration a year ago are recalled to secure the agreement of the provinces to a change in the constitution that would permit the formation of a loan council to control the borrowing and spending of the provincial governments.

It is hinted that the reason for Ottawa's anxiety to change the constitution was based on the knowledge that the question of provincial autonomy in monetary matters is left indefinite in the acts covering the constitution. Premier Aberhart refused to agree to any change in the constitution that would affect or weaken the provinces' autonomy in financial matters. He was partly supported by the premiers of British Columbia and Quebec, and the scheme was dropped by the Federal government.

Export-Import Bank Gives Credit To Italy For Cotton Purchase

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30—Cooperating with the Chase National Bank of New York, the Export-Import Bank here has agreed to extend $3,600,000 in credit to expedite Italian purchases of cotton, which have since the start of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict fallen off sharply. A possibility that credit may be increased to $8,000,000, in reported by authoritative circles.

The Bank in an effort to divert Italy's purchases from the Egyptian and Brazilian market is extending credit for nine months instead of the customary 60-day to 90-day period. Officials in allowing the loan declared that such a short-time commercial credit does not violate the Johnson Act which outlaws loans to nations which have defaulted the war debts to the United States.

Meanwhile, cotton men in New York are reported to be highly elated over the credit terms opining that the new agreement will deal a severe blow to Egyptian and Brazilian cotton interests.

New Hospital Aims To Eliminate Noise

Design For Structure At White Plains Includes Rooms Built On Angle

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Jan. 6—The new White Plains Hospital, preliminary plans for which were announced last night at a dinner in Rye, will be as nearly noiseless as a hospital can be made, it was learned today.

The reason for this feature is that Leonard Schultze of Schultze & Weaver, New York architects, who drew the plans for the proposed building, was disturbed by noise when he was a patient in the present thirty-year-old structure.

Mr. Schultze, whose firm designed the new Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, concentrated on the elimination of noise in preparing plans for the new $1,200,000 building, funds for which are now being raised, says N.Y. Times. The campaign will be conducted throughout the Winter and Spring, and construction will start at an early date, according to John W. Appel Jr., president of the hospital. Headquarters for the campaign are at 8 Church Street, this city.

The plans call for a modern central unit and west wing to replace the present main wing, and the remodeling and expansion of the present east wing. The east wing was built a few years ago and is of modern construction. Bed capacity will be increased from 120 to about 200.

All Rooms on South Side

The noiseless feature will be accomplished in part by building all rooms on the south side and by the elimination of all automobile traffic and parking from that side of the building. At present the parking space and ambulance entrance are on the south side. These will be replaced by gardens

Another feature will be the arrangement of rooms for private patients along the corridors in an oblique manner, so that a corner of each room comes out to the southern building line. In the triangles created by the space between the rooms will be porches, one adjoining each room. Construction will permit beds to be rolled onto the porches. Structural glass will be used extensively throughout the six-story building.

The object of the hospital board of governors, as stated in literature prepared for the campaign, is to create not only adequate modern hospital facilities for White Plains and adjoining communities but to provide a medical center as a clearing house for technical information for surgeons and practitioners.

Present Plant Held Inadequate

"The present plant," said the board's statement, "is totally inadequate to meet the need of the community today. The simple fact is that the community has completely outgrown the hospital's existing facilities. To provide better as well as more care, the hospital desires to complete a program of affiliation with outstanding medical institutions in New York City."

The hospital recently became associated with Memorial Hospital for the Treatment of Cancer and Allied diseases. In the new building "an unusual degree of privacy will be afforded to ward patients," no ward will have more than ten beds, there will be an auditorium seating 250 persons for medical and public meetings, a lecture room will adjoin the operating suite, galleries built for students and visiting physicians in the operating rooms and solaria on each floor.

Asks Rogue's Gallery For Husband's Portrait

PARIS.—A widow in Paris wants a photograph of her husband, even if it be only a rogue's gallery picture. She wrote to the public prosecutor:

"I am a widow and I haven't a photograph of my poor dead husband. Fourteen years ago he was arrested for murder, but it wasn't very serious and he got only five years in jail. When he was arrested he had his picture taken by the police and I would now like the picture."

Austria Feels Reich Accord Is Not Secure

Agitation And Even Hidden Sentiments Of Its Own Nazis Viewed As Danger

VIENNA.—In two recent speeches Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg has declared that the Austrian Communists are a much lesser danger to the present order than the Austrian Nazis. The speeches attracted general attention because they were made after the visit of the Austrian Foreign Secretary, Dr. Guido Schmidt, in Berlin, although it was officially hailed as a progress in friendship with the German Nazis.

Unofficially one heard that Schmidt's call was a disappointment, because Baron Neurath's diplomatic skill proved superior to Dr. Schmidt's. It is understood that, overwhelmed by the friendly reception in the German capital, Schmidt made concessions that embarrassed Chancellor Schuschnigg. They concerned things that look small in themselves, but are important for a little country endeavoring to protect itself against penetration by an ambitious neighbor, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. When Baron Neurath comes to Vienna in January, Schuschnigg will try to correct the mistakes made by his emissary.

Accord Not Secure

The lesson to be learned from this incident is that the newly made Austro-German friendship is a ticklish thing. Utterances of persons who occupy high places in the German Nazi hierarchy continue to create uneasiness in Vienna, and if one speaks with German residents of this city over a glass of wine they openly deride the idea that the Austro-German accord is more than a short reprieve.

The discrepancy between governmental and non-governmental expressions of opinion is sometimes quite amazing. Not long ago a high functionary in the German Tourist Department incensed the Austrian papers by a speech in which he said that German skiers who received permission and money to go to Austria must avoid hotels owned by Jews, and should stay in places the proprietors of which are Nazis. The same official scolded the Austrian authorities for giving too little prominence to the swastika and, he added, if the Austrians want to earn German money, they must first learn the lesson which the Third Reich teaches them. In Vienna this statement was interpreted as interference in the internal affairs of an independent state, and a diplomatic protest was lodged in Berlin. There are many instances in which Germany uses economic questions for political pressure.

Accord Is Valuable

Yet it would be wrong to condemn the July accord for these shortcomings. Normal neighborly relations are always a blessing, and those are wrong who say in all seriousness that the former state of tension was preferable because it was less complicated. However, it is not easy to make a Germanophile policy, as Schuschnigg does, and be against Anschluss at the same time. Cooperation with the country's own nationalists must at least be attempted, although their loyalty to Austrian independence ideals is doubtful. It is hard to draw a line between nationalists who are innocuous and clandestine Nazis who hide their feelings. The amateur armies which were a strong wall against internal enemies were dissolved. Military conscription permits nationalists of various colorings to join the army and form an uncertain element in it.

Under these circumstances it is understandable that the real independentists have become distrustful and feel uneasy whenever a so-called "Betoneer," that is, a nationalist who professes to be for independence, gets a job in the public services or the "Fatherland Front."

Reich Can't Move Now

A good safeguard that Austria will be left in peace is the general European situation as it is at present. It makes it unadvisable for Germany to undertake anything against this country. Then there is Premier Benito Mussolini, who will not tolerate infringements of Austria's sovereignty. Preservation of the small buffer state is as important for him as the independence of Belgium is for England.

Yet Austria, one day at a not too distant future, may be obliged to seek refuge in restoration of the monarchy. The air is again full of restoration rumors. At first the legitimists were stunned by the Austro-German accord, because they thought it contained a secret anti-Hapsburg clause. These apprehensions were dispelled. It is quite certain that no such clause exists.

In November the leader of the Austrian legitimists, Dr. Friedrich von Wiesner, consulted Premier Mussolini in Rome. He seems to have obtained encouraging assurances from Il Duce. Wiesner's usual speech at Otto's birthday celebration sounded very optimistic. Contrary to previous occasions he was cautious in the choice of what he told his audience, giving the impression that he was hiding important points in favor of Otto. He admitted that Germany and Yugoslavia still were hostile to restoration, but in the quickly changing political picture which Europe now presents a favorable moment for Otto's return may arrive overnight.

The New Earth Starts Tomorrow

age, is one of Japan's most popular young stars. Her exquisite beauty, charming grace, and refined gentility immediately attracted the talented German director. Her sympathetic portrayal of the heroine, Mitsuko, is truly an artistic masterpiece. For the male lead Mr. Isamu Kosugi, also of the Nikkatsu Studio, was chosen. Mr. Kosugi has long been an idol of Japanese moviegoers, and is loved for his manliness, and sincerity. Also the famous Sessue Hayakawa plays the part of the Samurai father of Miss Hara.

The picture was filmed at the J.O. Studios at Kyoto, and location trips were taken to almost every part of Japan including Mt. Asama, Mt. Fuji, The Japan Alps, Miyajima, Mito, and many other spots of scenic beauty. The superb photography of this film is one of its most outstanding features.

The story opens with the return of Teruo Yamato (Mr. Kosugi) from his eight-year sojourn in Europe. To greet him are the lovely Mitsuko, his fiancee (Miss Hara), and her father (Mr. Hayakawa) by whom he (Teruo) has been adopted in the Japanese custom. They are both disappointed to see him arrive in the company of a very beautiful German girl (Miss Ewelca) who is visiting Japan. These two are slightly enamored of each other, and Mitsuko finds the homecoming of her fiance a disheartening one. The story continues on with the entanglements of this Eurasian triangle. The lovely foreign girl understands the situation, and facing it practically gallantly attempts to re-unite her two betrothed friends. However, the plot takes a different turn, when Mitsuko, thinking that she is in the way, decides to throw herself into a volcanic crater.

In this vein the story continues with many interesting twists and turns, and the superb photography throughout makes this film a true masterpiece in entertainment.

"The New Earth" is a product of earnest endeavor, vigorous energy, patience, and months of tribulation. It is a truly great picture, and well deserves the honor of being the premiere film of its kind.

Dr. Miller Visions New Medical Era

Inaugurated As Academy Head, He Sees Baffling Problems About To Be Solved

Dr. James Alexander Miller, in his inaugural address recently as president of the New York Academy of Medicine, told an audience of physicians and surgeons that the medical profession "stands on the brink of more exact knowledge of metabolic disease, of respiratory affections, of numerous virus diseases, and even has hopes that, before long, dreaded cancer itself may yield up its secrets to the methods of modern research."

Dr. Eugene H. Pool, in his address as retiring president, said that "post-graduate instruction, especially in surgery, is the weakest link in the whole chain of medical education, for which no solution has yet been reached and the need for which is unparalleled in any other branch of medicine, says the New York Times.

Academy's Work Reviewed

Dr. Pool reviewed the work of the Academy of Medicine and its various committees. He also expressed the hope that the academy would support a plan to establish an institute of forensic medicine.

"About one-fifth of the deaths in Greater New York," he said, "come within the jurisdiction of the office of the Chief Medical Examiner. Over 3,000 autopsies are performed annually. The vast opportunities for research and teaching are to a great extent lost.

"It has been proposed that an Institute for Forensic Medicine be established around the office of Chief Medical Examiner, in organization and scope similar to institutes in some of the capitals of Europe."

Thomas D. Thacher, who was chairman of the New York City Charter Revision Commission, spoke on "Medicine and the State," criticizing advocates of socialized medicine under a system of compulsory health insurance. He cautioned the physicians, however, to take the leadership in extending proper medical care to those who need it and are at present unable to obtain it.

Dr. Miller discussed "Ideals in Medicine," which he classified as "scientific, clinical and ethical ideals." The clinical ideal was described by Dr. Miller as "the art which is distinct from the science of medicine." The ethical ideal, he defined as "the dedication of our knowledge, our powers and our gifts to the service of others rather than to hope of reward for ourselves."

"The tendency to get back to a better appreciation of individual and personal relationships in medicine," Dr. Miller continued, "is quietly gathering strength in a manner which may have a deep influence upon the future practice of medicine. In some countries, notably Italy, France, Germany and England, this movement has been dignified with a name. It is being discussed under the designation 'Neo-Hippocratism.'

Broader Viewpoint Sought

"Neo-Hippocratism voices a call to go back and sit at the feet of the ancient master. To think of the constitution and his nature. To consider disease as a disharmony of normal relations, as disturbance of function as well as change in structure; to consider the emotional, and the psychic as well as the physical, and to bring back personality as expressed both in patient and in physician, as a determining factor in successful treatment.

"On social service we are gradually coming to appreciate that a study of the living, working and economic conditions with which our patients are surrounded often illumines difficult clinical pictures and may point the way toward proper and adequate treatment."

Former Federal Judge Thacher said.

"Whatever view may be held of the extension of medical service afforded by agencies of the Federal, State or Municipal government, it is entirely clear that it is neither expedient nor wise to oppose such extensions as may clearly be justified in the service of the public.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Mary Boland Triumphs In Strong Screen Drama

A dramatic story of a mother placed in the position of turning her wayward son over to the police for murder, or letting die an innocent youth charged with the crime, was unfolded at the Hibiya Gekijo today when Mary Boland appeared in "A Son Comes Home," her first dramatic role on the screen.

In a plot charged with high-powered drama and filled with tense moments, Miss Boland completely subdued the sparkling mood with which she has been associated and stepped out as an actress with emotional power, bringing to the character all of the dramatic talent she displayed when one of prominent leading women of the New York stage.

And it was no easy role—that of Mary Grady, keeper of a Chowder House in a California town where she acts the good Samaritan to the waterfront while waiting word from the son who ran away fifteen years before.

She knows word will come, and it does. A youth in jail charged with murder claims to be her long-absent son. She rushes to him with an overflowing heart only to discover he is an impostor. But there is an appeal in the youth that gets her. He convinces her he is innocent and she decides to help him.

Then the strange twist in the story! Mary discovers the real murderer to be her own son, and she is placed in the unhappy position of either sending to his death the son who deserted her, or permitting the innocent youth who has won his way in her heart to die for the crime.

Miss Boland heads a capable cast of players with Donald Woods giving a splendid performance as the innocent youth. Julie Haydon makes her first screen appearance since "The Scoundrel" and is delightful.

London Prepares For C.C. Election

More Interest In Ballotting Seen Than Any Past Since World War

Preparations are now being made for the triennial elections to the London County Council, to be held on March 4, according to the London Times. Three years ago a Municipal Reform majority of 42 was converted into a Labor majority of 14, and six retiring Liberal or Progressive members were defeated. The Municipal Reform Party lost control of the Council after holding office continuously for 27 years. Liberal representation was completely eliminated, and the Labor Party, under Mr. Herbert Morrison, for the first time assumed responsibility for the administration of the county area.

By-elections since the new Council was formed have not altered the balance of the elected members. Labor gained a seat in Central Wandsworth and Dame Beatrix Lyall won back the seat in East Fulham which she lost in the general contest. Other by-elections produced no changes.

With aldermen, the Labor Party has at present a clear majority on the Council of 16. These are 11 Socialist aldermen and 69 councillors, while the Municipal Reform Party has nine aldermen and 55 councillors.

A Keen Contest

The sweeping character of the change over in 1934 caused surprise, and it is likely that the elections this year will arouse more interest than has been shown in L.C.C. contests since the War. Mr. Morrison said recently that the forthcoming fight would be the biggest in the history of London Socialism. He indicated that in his judgment another Labor victory would mean that they were going to govern London "for ever," but that if they failed it might take them 10 years to get back a majority. On the Municipal Reform side there was a feeling in 1934 that an effort concentrated into a short campaign before the poll should have been preceded by more effective preliminary work in the constituencies spread over a considerable period, and action based on the lesson learned is now being taken.

Municipal Reform candidates have already been provisionally chosen for most of the constituencies, and in others arrangements have been made with Liberal National organizations for the support of Municipal Progressive candidates. Many of the candidates have been in contact for some time with the electors they hope to represent, and they have been assisted by party workers. The National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations, in conjunction with the London Municipal Society, launched a program of educational lectures last October which has been largely concerned with imparting knowledge concerning local government.

The lectures have been given on Monday afternoons and Thursday evenings, at Caxton Hall, Westminster. Among the speakers have been:—

Sir George Hume, M.P., Sir Angus Scott, Alderman Sir Oscar Warburg, Alderman W. H. Webbe, leader of the Municipal Reform Party on the L.C.C., Alderman Eric Hall, Mr. E. W. H. Wood, Dr. F. Barrie Lambert, and Sir Samuel Gluckstein.

Now that the holiday is over, the program is being resumed, and Alderman Webbe is to speak on January 21 and February 1 on the program of the Municipal Reform Party.

Voluntary Workers Needed

Another feature of the preparatory work for the elections is the circulation of an appeal for voluntary assistance in clerical work, the distribution of literature, speaking at indoor and outdoor meetings, house-to-house visiting before the election, canvassing during the election campaign, and "fetching up" voters on polling day.

The appeal points out that Conservative and Liberal supporters of the National Government realize how much has been accomplished in Parliament by methods of sound finance and wise government. They should now, it is suggested, rally to the support of the Municipal Reform Party, which during 27 years of progressive administration secured equally sound government for London.

There is a lot of hard work to be done. At the L.C.C. elections in 1934, out of every 100 voters, 66 did not vote, 17 voted Labor, and 16 voted Municipal Reform. "These figures," the appeal states, "can and must be bettered," and the submission is made that it is of no use relying on a last-minute rush, or leaving the work to others.

On January 19 a "Ratepayers' Rally" luncheon is to be held at the Park Lane Hotel to raise funds to educate the electorate to the vital importance of the L.C.C. elections. Lady Maureen Stanley will preside, and Sir John Simon will be the chief speaker. A leaflet which has been distributed in large numbers by Municipal Reform workers in the constituencies during recent weeks states that since the Socialists captured the Council they have raised the county rate from 6s. 1½d. to 7s. 3½d. and criticizes Socialist administration in respect of housing, education, and other matters.

Labor Party Claims

The London Labor Party, in addition to defending the 69 seats now held, will nominate candidates in nearly all the divisions represented by Municipal Reform members. An intensive Labor campaign will be be opened at a demonstration in the Kingsway Hall on February 4, at which Mr. Harold Clay will preside. The speakers will include Mr. Herbert Morrison, M.P., and Mr. Lansbury, M.P. The Labor Party is stating that under their control of the L.C.C. 20,000 persons have been rehoused, and the Housing and Public Health Committee has faced its work on the basis that the campaign for the clearance of the slums is to be conducted until every London slum has gone. A mandate will be asked for to finish the work.

The London Liberal Federation proposes to take an active part in the March elections, and will put forward Independent Liberal candidates in constituencies, the number of which has yet to be finally determined.

London's Travel Facilities To Be Developed Widely

scheme. This part of the program provides for the electrification of the L.N.E.R. suburban lines in North-East London, and the construction of a tube railway to connect with them, so as to give a direct service to the Central London area. The London and North Eastern Railway Company will electrify the main line from Liverpool Street to Shenfield—passing through Stratford, Ilford, Romford, and Brentwood—and the Loughton and Grange Hill branch lines.

East London Tube Railway

The London Passenger Transport Board is constructing a tube railway to continue the Central London line eastwards from Liverpool Street. This railway will come to the surface at Stratford, to form a platform interchange with the L.N.E.R. Company's Shenfield service, and will continue again underground to Leyton, to form a junction with the Loughton line. The tube will then continue in an easterly direction via North Ilford until it reaches a point near Newbury Park, where it will again come to the surface to join with the Grange Hill loop line. This will permit of the through running of trains from both the Loughton and Grange Hill lines to the West End and beyond over the Central London line.

To deal with the increased traffic which the Central London line will have to carry as a result of these extensions it will be necessary to replace the existing rolling stock with stock of a larger and more modern type, to lengthen station platforms to accommodate longer trains, to equip stations with escalators, and to make other improvements. These developments, taken as a whole, will provide people living in the north-east parts of London with greatly improved train services and also with a direct service of trains to a large number of points in West Central London. The new tube railway will involve 10½ miles of tunnelling, and from Leytonstone to Newbury Park alone there will be a tunnel four miles long.

There will also be important improvements in North London railway services. The L.N.E.R. Company is to electrify the Edgware, High Barnet, and Alexandra Palace lines and to construct an additional track on the Edgware line. The London Passenger Transport Board will extend the Highgate tube to form a junction with these electrified suburban lines at East Finchley; and the northern City tube, which now terminates at Finsbury Park, will be extended to form a junction with the electrified suburban lines. Through services of trains will be operated from all branches to the City and from the Edgware and High Barnet lines to the West Central area. For passengers transferring from the Alexandra Palace line to the services running to the West Central area a convenient interchange station will be provided at Highgate (L.N.E.R.).

Great Western Plans

The Great Western Railway's contribution to the program involves the construction and electrification of two additional surface tracks alongside the line from North Acton to Ruislip and Denham. The Central London line trains will be continued over this line as far as Denham, and this will provide direct through services to and from Central London and the City. This improvement of railway services to the west of London will be a substantial benefit to areas in which there has been a great deal of housing and industrial development in recent years.

Another notable railway development is the construction of a tube railway from Finchley Road to connect with the Bakerloo line. This will enable through services of electric trains to be operated from stations on the Metropolitan line to the West Central area, as well as to the City, and a more regular and frequent service of trains will be provided. This tube railway will be constructed from the Bakerloo line at a point near Baker Street to Finchley Road, where it will form a connection with the tracks of the Metropolitan line; and the Metropolitan tracks from Finchley Road northwards will be rearranged to eliminate conflicting movements over the express and local lines. This scheme will consolidate the Metropolitan line with the other underground railways in London, and will provide adequate travelling facilities for an area in which extensive housing developments are taking place.

In addition to these major works a number of stations in the Central London area are being reconstructed and equipped with escalators in place of lifts, to deal more easily with the extra volume of traffic which will flow into the central area when the railway extensions are completed. The substitution of trams by trolley buses is proceeding steadily; and 1937 will see a more rapid replacement of old omnibuses by vehicles of modern types. By the end of the year all the old omnibuses of the N.S. type should have disappeared from the streets.

Wallace Opposes State Soil Power

Will Ask Congress To Retain Federal Control For The AAA, Despite Court Dictum

Secretary Wallace followed President Roosevelt's course recently in refusing to accept certain interpretations placed upon the Constitution by the Supreme Court. In announcing an administration decision to ask Congress to retain the agricultural conservation program under Federal control instead of turning it over to the States in 1938, Mr. Wallace ignored the court's dictum that "agriculture is a purely local matter," says the New York Times.

"The problems of agricultural prices, income and competitive exploitation of soil," he said, "have aspects which are more national than local and have no regard whatever for State lines."

This statement concluded the Secretary's declaration that State administration of the conservation program was impracticable, and that the provision in the present law directing that it be turned over to the States next year "should be postponed or should be repealed." He indicated that an amendment to the law would be introduced soon. Earlier in the day he had conferred with Speaker Bankhead on the farm program.

Wallace Answers a Question

Secretary Wallace was asked whether, in his opinion, it would be necessary to amend the Constitution in order to make possible direct control of agricultural production.

"On that I agree with the President," he replied.

When reminded, however, that AAA Administrator Tolley had held recently that direct control farm commodities was necessary to any solution of the farm problem, Mr. Wallace said he agreed.

"As enacted following the Hoosac Mills decision a year ago, the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act contains a provision requiring that administration of the agricultural conservation program be transferred to the States by Jan. 1, 1938," Mr. Wallace said.

"The Legislature of forty-three States are scheduled to meet this month. Many members are making inquiries as to whether this requirement must be met, and if so what kind of State enabling legislation could be enacted that would fill the needs.

"Along with such inquiries are coming, from many sources, expressions of skepticism as to the practicability of the requirement. Such expressions have come from farmers, farm organization leaders and representatives of land grant colleges and extension services, as well as from members of national and State Legislatures.

Practical Difficulties Emphasized

"While this provision of the law was enacted as an experiment worth trying, consideration and study in the past year have focused attention upon the practical difficulties involved. As I size up the feeling now of people interested in the present and future success of the AAA program, they believe that both national and local welfare call for its continued administration as a Federal program, with farmers, farm leaders and State college representatives participating directly in planning and operation.

"This widespread conclusion points to the conclusion that the effective date of the transfer to operation under forty-eight States' statutes should be postponed, or else the provision should be repealed. Operation of a national farm program under forty-eight different sets of auspices is not now practicable.

"The problems of agricultural prices, income and competitive exploitation of soil have aspects which are more national than local and have no regard whatever for State lines.

"The President in his message to Congress yesterday said:

"'That decent conditions and adequate pay for labor, and just return for agriculture can be secured through parallel and simultaneous action by forty-eight States is a proven impossibility.'

"I believe," the Secretary continued, "that the overwhelming majority of farmers will agree that in that statement the President has spoken the simple truth."

Firmer Control One Purpose

The announcement marked the first move in a series that is intended to end in complete Federal administration of the conservation program. Secrtary Wallace indicated, moreover, that not only would direct control of production ultimately be sought but that the measure of control would be even greater than under the orginal AAA.

Under the present law the AAA is empowered to preserve and improve soil fertility, promote economic use of land, and reduce exploitation and unprofitable use of national soil resources. These are the powers to which Mr. Wallace referred directly in his statement today when he said they should be reserved to the Federal Government.

The two other powers conferred by the law exclusively on the States, but which do not become operative until 1938, were:

"Provision for and maintenance of a continuous and stable supply of agricultural commodities adequate to meet domestic and foreign consumer requirements at prices fair to producers and consumers, and re-establishment and maintenance of farmers' purchasing power."

Germans Worry Over Situation Czechoslovakia

Communist agents at work among the minorities is put at at least 1,500.

The National-Zeitung takes a hand in the propaganda with an article on "World Bolshevism in 1936," illustrated by a map of Europe in which Czezchoslovakia and France are shown as "to a far-reaching extent Bolshevist," and are linked up by an arrow which is continued to Moscow.

Military cooperation between Czechoslovakia and Russis is the subject of an editorial article in the Borsen Zeitung, which roundly declares that the Soviet Government have assigned to the Czechoslovak armed forces the task of defending Czech territory until, through the arrival of enough Russian divisions, it can become a deploying area for Moscow against Germany. The work of the Czechoslovak armed forces has been adjusted, it is added, to the problems this role involves.

It is not astonishing, in view of the propaganda policy pursued here in regard to Czechoslovakia, that rumors should recently have connected that country with the German "explosion" which Dr. Schacht has foreshadowed if Germany does not soon achieve her colonial aims, and which have, indeed, been discussed as an escape from problems raised by other aspects of Nazi policy. Where speculations are apt, perhaps, to go wrong is in expecting the "explosion" to take the form of an immediate and straightforward armed conflict. Methods have changed. The anti-Bolshevist crusade, through the leadership of which Germany might incidentally attain much of the desired expansion of her hold on Eastern and Central Europe, is evidently held to demand a new indirect technique, modelled on that of the enemy. It is conceivable that the crusade could continue some time, as it has begun in Spain, without a direct clash between Germany and Russia.

"A Second Spain"

It might be a serious mistake to regard as a mere coincidence the forced propaganda about "Red" influence in Czechoslovakia and the talk now current in Nazi Party circles about the possibility of Czechoslovakia becoming a "second Spain." The "Red spearhead" in Central Europe is a watchword which might not only supplement but outweigh in value the grievances of the Sudeten Germans. There always seems to be at the right moment some foreign newspaper from which can be quoted hair-raising descriptions of Bolshevist interference in Czechoslovakia which cannot, if true, have escaped general notice. It is difficult, however, not to recall the allegations at the Nuremberg rally of the existence of 30 to 50 Soviet aerodromes in Czecholsovakia. Not only has this story been solemnly denied by Prague as an absurdity, but leaders of the Sudeten Germans themselves are known to have admitted in reply to private foreign inquiries that they were aware of nothing except that a few Soviet officers had been in Czechoslovakia.

As the Spanish case has proved, however, the extent of foreign interference in a country can easily become a matter of hot and endless dispute, out of which a fanatical and dogged propaganda system can derive much benefit. The ground has, moreover, been well prepared for the acceptance of any report about Czechoslovakia by the ceaseless wireless propaganda about the conditions under which the Sudeten Germans are alleged to live. Hardly a day has passed during the last 12 months without the broadcast from one at least of the German stations, or some items, often trivial, but always agitating to the German listener, about the lot of the Sudeten Germans.

Salamanca Claims Food Scarcity In Barcelona

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SALAMANCA, Feb. 2—Fascist military headquarters here today claimed that a serious food shortage has developed in Barcelona, leftist stronghold in Catalonia, and that even the restricted rations allowed by the authorities are no longer being distributed to the civil population. Discontent is being voiced by the press which assails the Government for being unable to solve the victualling problem.

Scientists Seek Influenza Vaccine

is the No. 1 victim for the disease and it attacks men and women alike.

In the recent epidemics of influenza all ages, both sexes and all races have been alike attacked, although in varying degrees. From the existing surveys of its extent, it was determined that the disease is most prevalent among persons under forty years of age. No consistent sex selection was shown, but it was demonstrated that Negroes are less susceptible to influenza than are whites.

Despite the heavy hand of the disease on persons forty or under, the death rate there is not as high as in the elder bracket. White persons, data shows, are less likely to die than are Negroes.

All persons are not equally susceptible to influenza. In the effect of the disease in this country it has been noted that urban life gives an apparent non-specific immunity, which seems to make the city-liver somewhat less susceptible to the disease and better able to withstand it. Certain persons seem naturally immune. As far as influenza is concerned, it has been noted, specific immunity to the disease is a greater protection than general physical health.

Immunity acquired against subsequent attack does not seem to last for more than a year. "At the present time," according to Dr. Francis, "experiments in human subjects vaccinated subcutaneously with the artificially cultivated virus are being carried out, and it has been found that the human individual also responds to vaccination with the development of antibodies in the blood without exhibiting any evidence of infection.

"A state of immunity develops as a result of experimental infection in animals, and in humans as a result of natural infection."

Until a fool-proof vaccine is developed there does not seem to be a great deal that can be done in the way of prevention. The war experiences demonstrated pretty well that quarantine, no matter how strictly enforced, is not certain of stopping influenza's spread. Cloth masks, sprays and gargles have been tried, but with no signal success. Immunization, preventive and curative, seems certainly to be the answer, but much is yet to be accomplished in this field.

However, there is much the individual can do if he thinks he is taking influenza. He should immediately go to bed and summon a physician, it was advised at the Academy of Medicine. Doctors there were agreed that by doing this the danger of complications would be greatly reduced. Influenza itself, they said, is not necessary dangerous, but it weakens the body, permitting other diseases to get a foothold, and, when complicated, may prove to be indeed dangerous.

Ruler Of Arabs A Man Of Peace

superb exhibition of their skill, says the Christian Science Monitor. The mapmakers recast their frontiers, and in a week Transjordan had become a kingdom which the kingmakers promptly offered to Abdullah with—mark you—a substantial subsidy for administration and a princely civil list.

It was certainly a haphazard beginning and for the first three years of his reign Abdullah led a royally haphazard life. It was not altogether his fault. His court was crowded with renegades from Feisal's fallen Damascus Government; his kingdom was wild and inaccessible; and his subjects were poor and resented any form of close government.

Brave Ruler

But Abdullah had both the courage to face a policy of retrenchment and the shrewd common sense of the Arab to know that if he did not put his house in order it would quickly fall about his ears. The crisis came in 1927—nine years ago—and in those nine years the face of Transjordan has been altered out of all recognition. The Emir voluntarily reduced his civil list; public expenditure was thoroughly overhauled; the army, the police and the judges were paid their salaries which were over a year in arrears, and a treaty of amity was signed with Great Britain which gave to the Emir enhanced presage and to Transjordan itself a reality which its haphazard beginnings had denied it.

It is still a poor country but it is no longer a hopeless one. Roads have been made through its length and breadth; the Emir's law runs in its furthest corners; order reigns and no longer is every man's hand against everyone; and, most important of all, the desert tribes, raiding from the east, who were formerly wont to look on Transjordan as a lucrative happy hunting ground, were given so salutary a lesson from British airplanes and armored cars that the Bedouin peasant can now raise his crops and pasture his flocks unafraid of the lawlessness which was the rule of other days. The Bedouin indeed are beginning to think in terms of prosperity and there are intriguing rumors of mineral wealth in the mountains and of lucrative tourist seasons, now that the roads to "rose-red" Petra—"half as old as time"—and to Amman and Gerash are safe and open.

Transjordan will never be great—outpost kingdoms rarely are—and King Abdullah has but a modest future before him. But he has achieved a measure of success which ten years ago no one—not even his warmest sponsors—dreamed possible. Then he was ringed with troubles. To the north the French Mandatory regarded him as a dangerous upstart and a menacing neighbor. To the west lived the wild Syrian desert tribes, who instinctively resented the arrival of one who would not acquiesce in their raiding proclivities; to the south Ibn Saud and his Wahabis were openly hostile to his house and all its soions; and to the west the complication of the Jewish-Arab problem in Palestine might easily have crushed a less wary statesman under a cruel load of mischief.

Tourist To Egypt Will Find Many Attractions There

The Nile, Relics Of Past, Modern Conveniences And Warm Climate Offered

Why should anybody spend a holiday in Egypt? There are so many answers to this question that it is a little difficult to know where to begin. For you might go to Egypt in order to enjoy a summer in winter; or to see the East; or to ride up the Valley of the Kings; or to spend a week looking at the Tutankhamen relics in the Cairo Museum. Any one of these answers would be sufficient.

When we left London in November it was bitterly cold, and there was a fog. There was a storm going across the Channel, and from the train that evening we could see that the land was all boggy and the trees bare and twisted.

The next morning the scene had miraculously changed. In Italy it was spring again. When you pulled up the blind of your sleeper, you saw that the sun was shining and that the trees were all white from the frost, so that they looked as if they were in bloom.

Four days later we were in Egypt, and it was summer. The land was lying very low under a blue sky and the water was sparkling under the sunshine, says the Observer. The pictures in the guide book suddenly came marvellously to life, enriched by a color and clearness of line that one had not expected. The grass was greener than anything I have ever seen, and every building was cut out very vividly against a blue background.

The Nile Route

The tourist can now follow one of two paths: he can go exploring in Cairo on his own, or he can go on to the popular, well-worn track leading to the temples and tombs of the ancient Pharaohs. If you decide on the latter, you go by train to Assiut and then change on to a steamer, a kind of show-boat, squat and square, which takes you up the Nile. They told me in Cairo that it would be cold in the evenings, but I never found it so. After tea we used to sit out under one of the decks, lazily looking at the broad, wrinkled, incredibly dirty Nile, while the sun went down over a flat landscape decorated with tall palm trees, an occasional village of mud huts roofed with dried grass, and men riding on camels and donkeys.

But it is the color of these evenings that you are likely to remember most. Sometimes it is disappointing, and reminds you exactly of those colored pictures of the East which with family portraits and a Biblical drawing, adorn every decent English boarding-house. But it is not always so. I remember sitting in a car in the Valley of the Kings waiting for a friend while the miracle of Egypt's changing lights was taking place all around me. The hills, which in the day are a clean pink, changed in a moment to an orange that was darkened here and there by patches of shadow. The sky went from blue to green, and finally to purple. And then suddenly, so suddenly that it was as if a man had turned off a switch, all the color was gone, and we were riding back in a great silence between the dark masses of the hills.

Royal Progress

The proper way to do this journey up the Valley of the Kings is on a donkey. Ignore the Ford cars, choose a donkey with stirrups, and enjoy as splendid a progress as any monarch. At one place the whole village turned out, and we jogged through the streets, followed by about fifty children, who came after us shrieking, quarrelling, shouting, all fighting over the spoils that the strangers were expected to disgorge.

In the Valley of the Kings, however, you will be accompanied by only one man, and can enjoy in peace as fine a sight as anywhere in the world. Do not despise these Egyptian donkeys and imagine that they are of the same family as those docile, stupid animals that we rode on at Margate in our childhood. The donkey I had at Luxor galloped for five miles without a pause, and moved so fast that its owner was forced to point out to me the empty state of his stomach. "Fast," he said, referring to Ramadan. I said I could not go any faster, and left him lamenting in the wastes.

There are other pleasures in donkey riding of a more malicious kind. You can watch the bearing of your companions. One member of our party, who had given us to understand that he hunted every week with the Quorn, was pitched off in the first half mile, and from that moment was spiritually deader than Humpty Dumpty. The donkey is a wonderful leveller.

From the Air

We did not come back from Aswan by boat, but by aeroplanes, climbing up over the hills from a desert aerodrome, and then striking out across the endless waste of hills that stretch for thousands of miles across Africa. Egypt, says E. M. Forster, "is a green strip of carpet, and walking up and down it (are) four sorts of animals and one sort of man." From the air that is exactly what Egypt looks like, a carpet, very rich and green, hastily rolled out on a grim landscape. The fertile land stops abruptly, as if somebody had slashed the edges of the carpet with a knife; and beyond is the sand, pock-marked and desolate.

So your visit comes to an end in what seems a matter of hours, and once more you are on the boat, looking down on the red tarbooshes of your friends. Later on, when Alexandria has disappeared, your mind tries painfully to put together the fragments of your recollections: you remember the vast, sprawling, formless priest city at Karnak; the mosques in Cairo; the dead city where nobody lives; the charming coptic monks who received you in an amusing ornate, curiously German room, where you drank coffee and strained to understand what they were saying; a desert oasis, where a magnificent keeper came and showed you something that he had just shot; the Aswan dam, one of the wonders of the world; innumerable birds; a tiny insect that had a face like the god Horus; friends, temples, sunsets; and finally that very characteristic sound at night—the continual barking of dogs.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB MEETING

At the regular meeting of the International Women's Club of Yokohama on Friday, February 12, at 3:30 p.m. Mrs. T. D. Walser of Tokyo will read Robert Sherwood's play, "Idiot's Delight," which was the Pulitzer Prize winner for 1936.

Robert Sherwood is the author of "Petrified Forest," "Reunion in Vienna," and other well known plays.

In its current success in New York City the leading roles in the play are taken by that popular couple, Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne.

The scene of this brilliantly successful work of Mr. Sherwood is laid in a mountain resort in the Italian Alps on the borders of Switzerland and France, and the leading characters are an American vaudeville artist touring cheap European theaters with a bevy of blondes, a mysterious white Russian "noblewoman" who looks strangely familiar to American eyes, and a sinister munitious magnate with financial interests in several countries and with loyalties in none.

The play, a Theater Guild production, opened in Washington, D.C., on March 9, with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne, and was produced in New York on March 24, 1936.

Shanghai is City Of Fascination, Asserts Writer

An Upstart, Built Up By 'Western Barbarians,' Hungry For Trade

The following story on Shanghai was written by William Henry Chamberlain, correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, on a recent trip there, reprinted from the Monitor:

One can never enter or leave this extraordinary commercial metropolis on the banks of the slimy Whangpoo river without feeling a curious sense of attraction and fascination. I have been a visitor in Shanghai three times, in 1927, in 1935 in 1936. Each time, as it happened, the city was faced with an interesting and dramatic situation.

In 1927, the tide of nationalist revolution had just begun to ebb after reaching a point so high that the more nervous and excitable foreigners were seeing visions of a new Boxer outburst. In 1935, the financial marts of the city were buzzing with excitement over the momentous abandonment of China's age-old measure of currency value, silver, and the substitution of a managed paper currency. On this, my last visit, the tense strain in Sino-Japanese relations lent dynamic possibilities to incidents that were small in themselves—a parade of Japanese tanks on the Bund, a strike of Chinese laborers in Japanese cotton mills, vague hints that the Japanese desired to take over entire police control of the large Hongkew districts where most of Shanghai's 30,000 Japanese dwell.

But the fascination of Shanghai does not lie in the headline news which it provides from time to time. Neither does it lie in the architectural beauty or the feeling of communion with a remote past that lend beauty and distinction to Peking and Kyoto and Delhi and Damascus. Shanghai is an upstart, a parvenu among the world's great cities, built up by "western barbarians," hungry for trade, on a mud flat which the Chinese had renounced as useless to themselves. And there is certainly no inspiration in Shanghai's flat surroundings, or in the city's climate.

No, the fascination of Shanghai, as I feel it, lies in two things: sharply vivid contrasts and amazing cosmopolitan diversity. Nowhere, I should think, is the juxtaposition of the modern West and the ancient East so striking. Along the Bund, where huge banks and office buildings look out on modern warships and great ocean liners, one can see a gang of sweating coolies, carrying a huge log or some other burden that machinery would take care of in most other countries, singing their chants of toil.

Great wealth and abject poverty, luxury and squalor, are crowded very close together within the confines of Shanghai. At one extreme one has the senior "taipan," or manager of some opulent, well established British bank or business, the successful investor or speculator, with his sleek limousine, his large comfortable home in the French Concession. At the other end of the scale is the Chinese apprentice, somehow keeping alive on a wage that would literally mean starvation to a Westerner, the Russian refugee who is never quite sure where his next meal or the roof to cover his head will come from.

As might be expected, one finds in Shanghai an unusual number of keen political and economic observers, both Chinese and foreign. Here the element of contrast is furnished by the city's plentiful crop of cranks and bores, who fill the columns of the tolerant and long-suffering newspapers with long letters and full-dress debates about their pet-hobbies.

Much more serious is the plight of those exiles who have no chance of returning to their native countries. By far the largest and most visible of these groups, of course, consists of the Russians, whose numbers are roughly estimated in the neighborhood of 20,000. Whatever their number, they are somehow able to support three newspapers and they make a substantial contribution to the musical and dramatic life of Shanghai. Whole streets in the French Concession, where most of the Russians live, display almost exclusively Russian signs: restaurants, bakeries, and shops of all kinds.

Among the older Russians, especially among those who took an active part in the civil war, one finds an outlook very similar to that of the Confederate veterans who are depicted in "Gone With the Wind." They gather in their clubs and have their military reunions and fight over in imagination the campaigns of the civil war and discuss what might have been if only this or that military or political maneuver had been made at the right time. Two things bind them together: passionate hatred of bolshevism and loyalty, a little pathetic, at times, a little strained, to the old Russian ways and beliefs and customs that have indeed "one with the wind."

It is not only refugees who color the cosmopolitan pattern of Shanghai life. There are the huge turbaned Sikhs, brought in from India, who constitute a considerable part of the police force. There are men and women of all countries of Europe and Asia and the Americas, coming for business or pleasure to the great port in the Orient. One does not have to walk far in Shanghai to hear a variety of tongues that might suggest the Tower of Babel. And over the city hover the clouds of uncertain political and economic complications. Taking a last look at the skyline of the port as one sails away down the Whangpoo river one wonders what destiny holds in store for Shanghai, which of its varied and competing racial influences will prove strongest and most enduring.

4,000,000 Britons Helped By Wage Increases

period came about in the railway trades. The Railway Staff National Tribunal awarded an aggregate of £1,170,000 to 400,000 employes in August. This was made up of almost complete restoration of the balance of wage cuts and increased pay for overtime.

In October 622,000 workers received wage increases, which added a total of £35,000 to their weekly wages bill. There were, once more, no important reductions reported by the Ministry of Labor.

The chief increase in this case affected men in the engineering industry, whose wages were raised by 1s. a week. Textile bleachers in Yorkshire, Lancashire, Chestire, Derbyshire and Scotland, and many workers employed by Local Authorities in London, the Midlands and the North, also enjoyed raised pay.

Rises in Heavy Industries

November showed an increase in the wages of 223,000 workers, representing £20,200 weekly. Again no important decreases were reported.

Workers most affected were those in tinplate factories, midland coal mines, iron and steel mills in the midlands and Yorkshire and Lancashire, hosiery workers in the midlands, and brickmakers in various districts.

In December further increases were awarded, culminating in the publication, toward the end of the month, of a general 10 per cent advance to Yorkshire wool operatives and later increases recorded above in garment, cotton and chemical trades, all scheduled to be brought into effected early in 1937.

Rail Case Undecided

One of the trade union battles which has caused most interest in Britain has been that of the Locomotive Engineers and Firemen's Union. The workers represented by this asociation were not affected by the wage increases awarded in August to other railway workers and in December the union claimed a six-day week, of six hours a day, besides substantial increases in wages and reductions in pay-cuts, for various classes of firemen and engineers.

The railways claimed it would cost them nearly £10,000,000 a year to meet these claims, and £40,000,000 to implement them among all other grades of railway workers. The question is now being considered and the Railway Tribunal will give its decision later in 1937.

A Strange Coincidence of the Sea

On December 6, 1917, the outgoing Belgian relief freighter "Imo" crashed into the incoming steamship "Mont Blanc," laden with 400 tons of munitions, including 580 tons of TNT, in the harbor of Halifax, Nova Scotia. The result was one of the greatest disasters of the World War. There were more than 5000 casualties, of which 1626 were fatal. 20,000 people were rendered homeless and the property damage was estimated at $50,000,000. The "Imo," which had caused this disaster, struck a rock and sank off the Falkland Islands on December 6, 1921, on the fourth anniversary of the Halifax disaster.

Budge Is Beaten By 'Bitsy' Grant By 6-2, 7-5 6-0

N.Y. Herald Tribune

CORAL GABLES, Fla., Jan. 9.—Bryan M. (Bitsy) Grant, the Atlanta giant killer, defeated Donald Budge, the nation's No. 1 tennis player, 6—2, 7—5, 6—0, in the final of the Miami Baltimore tournament today.

Budge's service appeared to go to pieces and the diminutive Georgian almost had a romp through the three straight sets. In the first, after Budge held his own serve, Grant ran five straight games, with a deep slice to the Californian's forehand his principal weapon. Several of Bitsy's drop shots were aces. On set point Budge's return hit the tape and fell back into his own court.

In the second set both twice lost their own serves to make it 2-all. Grant advanced to 4—2 on neat passing shots and well placed drives. Budge's net play then gained him a 5—4 advantage, but Bitsy pulled out the set by his steadiness. In the tenth game Grant won after being down 15—40.

Budge went to pieces in the third set, double-faulting repeatedly, including the game point in the first game. Grant's court covereage was pretty and he made several almost impossible gets.

Budge and his partner, Arthur Hendrix, of Lakeland, Fla., continued their doubles sweep in the quarter-finals, eliminating Dick Morris, of Orlando, and Mac McAllister, of Miami, 6—2, 6—3. Frankie Parker, of Milwaukee, and Gardnar Mulloy, of Miami, defeated Elwan Cooke, of Los Angeles, and Vernon Marcum, of Orlando, 2—6, 6—3, 6—4.

On the other side of the bracket, Grant and Wayne Sabin, of Los Angeles, disposed of John Hendrix, of Lakeland, Fla., and Marion Reese, of Atlanta, 6—3, 6—4, while Ricardo Morales and Gustavo Vollmer, the Cuban team, defeated Charles Harris, of Palm Beach, and Carroll Turner, of Miami, 6—1, 6—1.

The semi-finals and final in the doubles will be played tomorrow.

Medical Centers To Link Americas

Plan For Far-Reaching System Of Schools And Hospitals Revealed To Doctors

A far-reaching plan to establish Pan-American post-graduate schools and hospitals in all the large cities of Central and South America, was revealed recently by Professor Jose Arce, dean of the University of Buenos Aires, before a distinguished gathering of physicians at the Metropolitan Club, New York, according to the New York Times.

Professor Arce, who is president of the Argentine Chapter of the Pan American Medical Association, was guest of honor at a dinner of the New York Chapter of the Association.

Three physicians of this country welcomed the plan with statements that the future of civilization now centered in the Western Hemisphere and that the course of that civilization depended to a large extent upon the "philosophy" developed by physicians.

The three speakers for this country were Dr. Charles Gordon Heyd, president of the American Medical Association; Dr. James Ewing of Memorial Hospital, one of the world's leading authorities on cancer, and Dr. Dean Lewis of John Hopkins University, former president of the American Medical Association.

Urges Example to World

Declaring that he was "very much depressed" at the spectacle of Hitler and Mussolini and general conditions in Europe, Dr. Lewis said hope for the world now lies in the Western Hemisphere. Medical cooperation between North and South America, he said, should set an example for the rest of the world.

Dr. Ewing declared that "if we are to be saved we will be saved by the medical profession and the philosophy of the medical profession."

Dr. Heyd said the Western Hemisphere stands as a bulwark of liberalism and republicanism and that in this bulwark, "the medical profession will play no small part."

The plan announced by Professor Arce is for the establishment throughout the Republics of Central and South America of medical centers similar to one proposed for New York City about a year ago.

The New York City medical center, which calls for an outlay of $20,000,000 in building and endowment, was heartily endorsed by President Roosevelt when it was explained to him last year by Dr. Joseph J. Eller of New York, director general of the Pan American Medical Association.

Dr. Eller said at the time that the President had expressed the hope that similar institutions would be established in other large cities of the Western Hemisphere.

Project Here Is Model

"I can say that Argentina will do everything possible," Dr. Arce said, "to follow New York with a similar center as soon as possible. Nothing could be more desirable than to have in New York the first great Pan-American Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital, which is to be followed later by similar institutions in the Argentine, Brazil, Mexico and in large cities elsewhere.

"We realize that the project is a gigantic one and will require tremendous efforts for achievement. However, the contributions to humanity which will result from the fulfilment of such a creation makes it worthy of the cooperation of every single physician in the Western Hemisphere.

"No time could be more opportune for the realization of this project. Political conditions prevailing in European countries have resulted in a deterioration of the scientific values which were a credit to these countries in the past. Students are now looking to the Americas for scientific instruction and we now find a steady flow of students here and proper provision should be made to accommodate their needs."

Dr. Arce and Dr. Heyd, it was revealed, will receive honorary degrees of Doctor of Science at the Foundation Day exercises of Temple University, Philadelphia, on Feb. 15. Dr. Arce was received recently by President Roosevelt at the White House.

Dr. Edward L. Kellogg, president of the New York Chapter of the Pan-American Medical Association, was toastmaster at the dinner, which was attended by about 250 physicians from New York and other parts of the country.

Anti-Chiang Plot Laid To Nanking

we had in view for the adoption of a defined national policy and the effecting of changes permitting the nation to develop logically and freely politically and materially.

Welcomed Any Emissary

"I therefore telegraphed on the night of the fourteenth welcoming any one to come from Nanking to hear the generalissimo's views and arrange with him for the necessary safeguarding to prevent the development of civil war.

"The generalissimo naturally vigorously demanded that he be released and proceed to Nanking, but while I personally had full confidence that he would carry out his promises, it was impossible to risk his being persuaded after his arrival in Nanking to continue the warfare his colleagues there had launched and which they undoubtedly would desire to keep going in preference to materializing active defense against Japan."

Further stressing that it was strange Nanking had not sent any emissary, Chang Hsueh-liang closed his statement with the declaration that he was ready to proceed to Nanking, stand trial before the nation and accept punishment.

That a virtual impasse has developed in Nanking is evidenced by the fact that although Chang Hsueh-liang has been pardoned he is kept under surveillance by the Military Affairs Commission and also that while Chiang Kai-shek is in retirement at Fenghua, armies have been ordered to march through Shensi and occupy Sian and Lanchow, Kansu's capital.

This military movement is deplored by those who feel that military pressure now will probably result in having Chang Hsueh-liang's and the other armies involved in the Sian coup join with the Communist forces.

Any such development would give Japan the desired pretext for drastic action, it is asserted, and this is believed by certain circles to be precisely what the Nanking "cabal" was aiming to achieve when it sought to launch a punitive expedition against Sian.

The upshot of the Sian affair, according to the version now presented, has been that Chiang Kai-shek did not find enemies to the continuance of his power in Sian but his most dangerous enemies in his own capital.

In his retirement at his ancestral home at Fenghua the generalissimo today must be fighting probably the gravest battle of his whole career. He must decide whether to compromise with the reactionary clique in his own capital or whether to oust them, by force if necessary. Then he might proceed rapidly toward founding a popular constitutional government and rallying all the country's patriotic forces to his support for resistance against Japan and war if necessary as the only way of saving China's self-respect.

USSR Budget Increased A Third; Fascism Cited

increased 19 per cent last year."

Although Mr. Grinko did not mention it, the government and Communist party leadership announced today increases in the salaries of teachers in all categories, but even at the new schedules a university-trained teacher receives less monthly than a Sakhanoffist manual worker in a well-run factory.

The total budget, even as estimated by Mr. Grinko, does not contain all the government expenditures, for several million rubles will also be spent by the administrations of the constituent republics of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Grinko revealed that 32,500,000,000 rubles would be spent during the current year on capital construction. There is deep significance in the fact that the next highest expenditure will be for education—18,500,000,000 rubles this year, compared with less than 14,000,000,000 last year. This, however, might almost be termed a patriotic expenditure, for although there are many purely cultural elements in Soviet education, its main task is to train children into perfect Bolsheviki, ready to die if necessary for their country and their system.

The health budget also is raised this year from 5,800,000,000 rubles in 1936 to 7,500,000,000.

Mr. Grinko said the current year would witness a 20 per cent increase in all industrial production and a 23.8 per cent increase in trade turnover.

Joseph Stalin attended the meeting during the early part of the session, entering unostentatiously, as he always does and taking an obscure seat on the dais, half hidden by a pillar. For a time Marshal Klementy E. Voroshiloff, Defense Commissar, sat with him, chatting animatedly. Soon, however, both disappeared.

Venturi Battles Ambers To A Draw Although Floored

By JAMES P. DAWSON

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Jan. 9—Enrico Venturi, hurdled his most important American bout last night without victory or defeat but with added prestige.

Victor in twelve straight bouts since coming to this country six months ago, Venturi held the world lightweight champion, Lou Ambers of Herkimer, N. Y., to a draw in ten fast rounds of boxing that satisfied a crowd of more than 9,000 fans at Madison Square Garden. Ambers' title was not at stake. The gross receipts amounted to $18,886.

The decision, in which Referee Artie McGovern and Judges Charles Lynch and Martin Monroe collaborated, met with only an echo of dispute among the crowd, which held Ambers a favorite at 9 to 5 when the bout started. This writer had Ambers in front on a round-won basis by a count of six to four.

Champion Starts Well

The champion received the first three sessions, the seventh and eighth and the tenth. Venturi clicked in the fourth, fifth, sixth and ninth. Though nonplussed at times by the antics of the champion, Venturi made the fighting over most of the journey and undoubtedly received credit for this on the official score sheets. At any rate, there was little disposition among critics to condemn the verdict. It was generally accepted as fair.

Ambers might have won, and won decisively, had he followed throughout the bout the pace and snappy fighting style he flashed as the struggle started.

He might even have won off by himself had he thrown into the intermediate rounds some of the dazzling boxing he withheld until the eighth and tenth. But between the third and seventh the Herkimer Hurricane became a gentle zephyr after flooring his rival and staggering him dangerously. And Venturi profited accordingly.

Venturi Hits the Canvas

It was in the second round that Ambers dumped his foe as cleanly as ever a boxer was floored. After an opening round of blinding speed Ambers turned his rival half way around with a right to the jaw in the second and when Venturi about-faced, another right, sharp and powerfully driven to the chin, dropped Enrico for a count of one.

In the third Ambers drilled that right again to the jaw in an exhibition of punching that was amazing for so light a bitter. Or maybe it was a reflection of weakness in Venturi's jaw. At any rate, Venturi's legs buckled and there was imminent danger of his taking another trip to the canvas.

Then a different battle started. Ambers, for some unknown reason, took to pot-shooting at Enrico's jaw in the fourth. Meanwhile, Venturi plodded steadily along, carrying the fighting, charging in on the attack, retreating nimbly, and battering Ambers consistently with long lefts and rights to the body, sharp lefts to the face, and occasional roundhouse rights to the head, face and jaw. This continued through the fourth, fifth and sixth rounds, and had Ambers so confounded that he tripped and almost fell as his feet became entangled in retreat in the sixth.

A Steady Advance

The seventh and eighth saw Ambers awakening and peppering his rival, but not with enough zip to his blows to discourage Venturi's steady charge forward. In the ninth Venturi cast all caution to the winds and slapped and cuffed and hammered the champion as if he were just a novice. In one mix-up in this round Ambers skidded on the wet canvas in his own corner and wound up swinging on the lower ring rope like the man on the famed trapeze.

Ambers returned to his dazzling boxing style in the tenth and boxed in masterful fashion, making his own openings, feinting Venturi into foolish leads and popping a right or left straight to the face at close quarters. But Venturi kept charging until the final bell, and then had his reward in a draw.

Ambers weighed 136 pounds and Venturi 138¼.

Montreal Skaters Vanquish Yale, 7-1

N. Y. Times

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Jan. 9—Montreal University closed its first hockey invasion of the United States tonight before 1,500 persons with a 7-to-1 victory over Yale in an International Intercollegiate League contest.

Since they left Canada, the Montreal skaters have conquered Dartmouth and Princeton, as well as Yale. Tonight, the team revealed a brilliant skating and attacking combination which scored all of its goals mainly through individual effort.

Clint Childs, who swept through the Canadian defense for Yale's score early in the second chapter, also whipped the rubber into the strings on a solo effort.

With Captain Moore, Middleton and Pearce out of the Yale line-up, the sextet improvised by Coach Holcomb York, revealed a powerful offensive throughout most of the first period, but superior goal guarding by Barsalou checked vicious thrusts by Dud and Gil Humphrey and other Elis.

Scoring Starts Early

Lecavalier poked a high straight-on shot that eluded Mills, new Yale goalie, for the opening score, at 3:56, then the Elis stopped their rivals till near the end of the session.

Gagne then tricked Mills out of position for two unassisted short-scoring pokes, the first at the sixteen-minute mark, and the next thirty-six seconds later.

With a lead of 3—0 starting the second period, Ouimet registered almost from the face-off, slipping a poke into the cage from the left at 0:53. Three seconds later Childs nudged a passage through the Montreal secondary line and whipped the rubber past Barsalou for an Eli goal. Armand duplicated the feat six minutes later.

Boies and Vance teamed in an attack that rocked Barsalou several times, but he kept his net clear. The Montreal defense was penetrated repeatedly by Platt and Badger until the second-period gong sounded, but Yale was unable to count again.

Pearce in Eli Nets

Pearce was in the Yale nets as the third period got under way. The attack of both sextets faltered as the rival goalies, Barsalou and Pearce, were applauded for dazzling saves, which held the session scoreless, amid a deluge of shots, until the final five minutes.

Armand, taking a pass-out from behind the cage, tucked it into the Eli cage at 15:40. The Captain Mignault-Armand goal followed at 16:17 and it proved the final counter of the one-sided contest.

The line-up:

Pos.	Yale (1)	Montreal (7)
Goal	Mills	Barsalou
Defense	Platt	Mignault
Defense	Jackson	Rivet
Center	Childs	Armand
Wing	Badger	Lecavalier
Wing	Buckley	Gagne

Spares:—Yale: G. Humphrey, Gagarin, Robinson, Pillsbury, Gibson, D. Humphrey, Nagle, Boies. Montreal: R. Grignon, Quimet, Genier, J. Grignon, Picard.

Referees—N. Shay and L. Morrissey. Time of periods—20 minutes.

Speaking for Himself

When the See of York fell vacant in the reign of George II, the King consulted the Rev. Dr. Mountain about whom he should appoint.

The doctor replied, "Hadst thou faith as a grain of mustard seed thou would say to this Mountain"—at the same time laying his hand on his breast—"be removed and be thou cast in the See."

The King laughed heartily and conferred the perferment on the facetious doctor.—Edinburgh Dispatch.

Japanese Picture Showing At Nichigeki

Chojuro Kawararazaki and Kanyemon Nakamura of the Zenshinza Troupe are featured in the PCL film "Sengoku Guntoden" that opens at Nippon Gekijo Thursday. The scene of the picture is laid in the feudal Japan some four centuries ago, and the two celebrated actors play the parts of two leaders of a gang of bandits. Love interest is provided by Sachiko Chiba, a P. C. L. star.

Many scenes of "Sengoku Guntoden" were shot at the foot of Mt. Fuji with the famous mountain in the background. The film was directed by Eisuke Takizawa.

Madam Toshiko Hachisuka

EXHIBITION OF HOMESPUN GOODS

Madam Toshiko Hachisuka, sister of Marquis Masauji Hachisuka, has opened today her second exhibition of homespun goods, including dress goods, cushions, handbags, neckties, zori, and chairs made with homespun fabrics woven by herself, at the Kanebo Service Shop, Ginza. The exhibition will continue until February 15.

Madam Toshiko Hachisuka is one of the pioneer homespun fabric makers of the country, and is further well known as an artist and designer. It was about five years ago that she first tried to weave homespun fabrics using wool produced at her father's farm in Hokkaido. Since then, she has given untiring efforts not only for producing good homespun fabrics, but particularly for making such fabrics characteristically Japanese. Thus among the homespun goods exhibited there are such of entirely different weaves and colors than those made in Western countries. It is her hope to utilize homespuns for Japanese dresses as well. In these many years she has trained many girls from various prefectures to encourage farmers to make homespuns in their spare times.

Among the exhibits shown at the Kanebo Service Shop, there are also cushions made of specially woven homespuns and embroidered; handbags also made of homespun goods and made according to her new designs; Japanese zori made of homespun fabrics and also embroidered; and neckties of homespun goods. In colors and designs, Madam Hachisuka's articles are always unique, as it is her attempt to use the homespuns to the best advantage, while preserving as much as possible Japanese artistic effects.

Madam Hachisuka is not a mere handicraft maker: she is a poet and an artist. Her products are not made for any commercial aim, but for giving new works to farmers and at the same time to introduce new and artistic goods for the public.

Kichiyemon Plays Many Leading Roles

proves full credit to himself by ably playing his difficult part.

In the "Goshozakura Horikawa Youchi," one-act play out of the Kabuki repertoire, Kichiyemon again plays the leading role of Benkei, the faithful retainer of Yoshitsune, the historic hero, with his characteristic interpretation of the part. The part of Owasa, Benkei's old time sweetheart, is played by Sojuro with the skill and success deservedly his own.

The tense feeling suffered by a packed house due to the pathos of the above two tragedies will be happily relieved by a two-act comedy that ensues, entitled "Tsuzuriawase Shin Hizakurige" which is from the pen of the well-known playwright Kawatake Mokuami. Here both Sojuro and Tomoyemon appear in the farcical casts of Yajirobei and Kidahachi whose nonsensical blunders committed evoke a round of convulsive laughter.

The last on the program is the delightful piece of posture dances entitled "Bunya and Kisen" in which Kichiyemon and Sojuro play leading roles, the former that of Bunya the poet and the latter that of Kisen the priest and poet.

Shimpa Program At Kabukiza Is Excellent

rises and there behind the footlights are 200 members of the shimpa stage, with the more prominent artists lined up, 25 strong, in the front row. Reminiscences of the early days of the art are given by several of the veteran actors. And of course, they make a plea for continued support of the shimpa plays.

To this reviewer, there was one shortcoming. All five plays are of serious theme. One at least should have been a comedy. But most of the theater-goers, many of them middle-aged women, like to have a good cry, and this apparently must have been the reason for the selection of the program. Of course comedy relief is provided here and there, but such parts do not take the place of a full play.

The stage effects are particularly good. They attain a high degree of realism and to the foreign newcomer, they should prove to be most interesting.

The first play on the program is "Furi-dashita-yuki" or "The Snow Beins to Fall", a play in five scenes by Mantaro Kubota with stage setting by Kenkichi Yoshida. Rokuro Kitamura takes the leading role of a young woman, sadly disappointed with life, and finally disappears. That, she believes, is her only course of action in the face of a request of her former husband to return to him, and consent given by her aunt on her behalf to another suitor. Not many are the lines spoken by Mr. Kitamura but his mannerisms are virtually perfect and hence the role is quite aptly portrayed. The scene is Fukagawa, one of the slum districts of Tokyo.

Kawai Is Convincing

Takeo Kawai, who with Rokuro Kitamura are considered the two leading actors portraying women's roles, is featured in the second play, "Senso-ji-keidai" or "The Precincts of the Senso-ji Temple", a love tragedy in two acts. He appears as Oraku, a waitress of a waiting house, the central character of the play, and is convincing. Shibasaki, captain of a poaching vessel, meets her at the temple grounds after a space of many years and he renews his courtship. Though Oraku is fond of him, a misunderstanding develops, and outwardly she spurns his advances. But when he is betrayed to the police by her common-law husband, a cripple, because of jealousy, she kills him and then loses her mind.

Masao Inouye, excellent actor, and Miss Mizutani, whose troupes appeared in joint programs frequently during the past year, are responsible for the success of the third play, "Shinjitsu-ichiro" or "Truth First" by Yuzo Yamamoto in six scenes. Here is a play in which the very complicating connections of a successful business man, a former student duty-bound to his former employer, with his wife, daughter of the same employer, are related. Mr. Inouye rises to great heights in his characterization of the role and Miss Mizutani too is convincing as the wife who believes in a free life.

Mr. Kitamura and Tomosaburo Ii appear in the fourth number on the program, "Yushima-no-keidai" or "The Precincts of the Yushima Shrine", a play in one act, adapted by Karyo Kawamura from a famous novel by Kyoka Izumi, entitled "Onna-Keizu" or "Her Lineage." Mr. Kitamura is a geisha, "Otsuta," who must separate from her lover, played by Mr. Ii, because of the latter's obligation to his benefactor. The charm of this Otsuta, portrayed by Mr. Kitamura, is one that will be long remembered.

Miss Mizutani In Lead

Miss Mizutani takes the leading role in the concluding play, "Uzumaki" or "A Swirl," in four acts. Its plot is an attempt by Takaaki Higashioji to usurp his wife's fortune, the latter character being played by Miss Mizutani. He is a "yoshi," or one who has been married into the Higashioji family to carry on the family tree. He fails through the loyal support of his wife's servants. Shotaro Hanayagi pretty nearly steals the play away with his superb performance of the physically strong nurse-maid. Mr. Inouye contributes excellent support as the cousin of the young wife.—L.N.

Draws The Line

To prove that she's not superstitious, Katherine Locke, pretty brunette star of the legitimate stage, who makes her screen debut in "Straight From the Shoulder," which opens tomorrow at the Nippon Gekijo, called the assembled troupe together while on location, and proceeded to work. She threw her hat on the bed, walked under a ladder, and whistled in her dressing room.

Then Ralph Bellamy and Onslow Stevens showed up, each with a cigarette in his lips. They solemnly lit theirs—and offered Miss Locke a third light from the same match. She shook her head violently. That was the one superstition she wouldn't break—because she doesn't smoke!

Latent Linguist

That 6-year-old Charles Quigley, Jr., son of the Hollywood leading man, gives high promise of being an unusual linguist is indicated, Quigley believes, by the fact that the boy already speaks two unusual languages in addition to English.

These two languages, learned by the child from his grandparents, are Swedish and Irish Gaelic.

Quigley, featured with Rosalind Keith in Columbia's picture "Find The Witness", is half Swedish and half Irish, although born in America. Mrs. Quigley, the former Harriet Blue, is trained in French as well as English.

"I believe in the British system of teaching foreign languages to children when they are quite young," said Quigley. "We expect to get a special language tutor for our son within a few months and give him a chance to develop his seemingly natural aptitude as a latent linguist."

Britain's Radio Tuned For Duty If War Comes

Government Will Take Over Entire System At Start For Its Propaganda Value

LONDON.—With the expansion of the navy, air force and army well under way, the British government is now bringing up to date its fourth line of defense and offense—propaganda, the power of the word, spoken or printed.

Great Britain's propaganda succeeded like no other country's during the World War. Rightly or wrongly, it was credited with helping to win the United States and other neutrals over to the Allied side, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. Writers and illustrators, bishops and politicians were mobilized to sell British patriotism to the world. Propagandists began arriving in New York by the boat-load.

Should another war come over here, this propaganda then will reach America not only by boat but through the ether.

Recently outsiders got a peep into the mysterious goings-on at Broadcasting House in Portland Place, which is the headquarters of the British Broadcasting Corporation, and may well be the nerve center of Great Britain in the event of war. Through an indiscretion in London's otherwise discreet press, the readers learned that the government is busy there codifying a scheme to take over all microphones and transmitters the minute war breaks out.

Government Rules Radio

Even now the British Broadcasting Corporation, which has a broadcasting monopoly in this country, is subsidized and supervised by the government. The government's influence is felt most by the listening public at critical times, such as the recent abdication crisis, when news bulletins cease to contain much real information of what is taking place.

The censorship will be complete when war breaks out. Military business and propaganda will take precedence on the air over dance bands and cockney comedians. No crooner will be able to sing "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling" without consideration of its relation to President Eamon de Valera's Irish Free State.

In common with most European countries, Great Britain is understood to have millions of printed mobilization order forms stored away in warehouses against the evil day. It is doubtful now whether the printed forms have not been rendered obsolete by radio. At a given signal from Downing Street, war and mobilization could be proclaimed to the whole country in a jiffy by one man seated before a microphone at Broadcasting House.

It is certain that the B. B. C. will be the government's mouthpiece for announcements, for air raid warnings and for instructions about evacuations and food rations. And in addition to the much matter-of-fact messages to the home folks, microphones will be pressed into service at suitable hours to propagandize from Great Britain's point of view to Europe and America and the world at large.

Cabinet Backs Plan

The British Cabinet is behind the plan to mobilize the B. B. C. for war. The Cabinet's man Friday who is doing the work is Lieutenant Colonel Ronald Sempill Howard Stafford.

The British Broadcasting Corporation explains to officials that Lieutenant Colonel Stafford is bringing up-to-date "routine preparations for action in the event of war. It is regarded as obvious that measures must be considered in connection with any contingency which may affect in some degree or other the vital service of broadcasting."

The new monopoly arrangement between the government and the corporation's board of governors which became effective on January 1 provides that if an emergency arises the Postmaster General may instantly take possession of the B. B. C. properties.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Dog Eats Lipstick

"Penny Fizz", tiny canine actress who in the arms of her mistress, Rita La Roy, is playing her first part in pictures, proved that she has a natural trouper's love for makeup.

Left in Miss La Roy's sound-stage dressing room on the set of Columbia's "Find The Witness", the seven-pound, three-year-old dog ate up the actress' lipstick.

"And was her face red!" exclaimed Miss La Roy. "But it will be redder when she finds I've taken it out of her salary. That was a dollar lipstick. Instead of sirloin steak she gets scraps the rest of this week."

Miss La Roy, in the role of a temperamental opera star who carries the proverbial "Peke"-type dog through the picture, volunteered to use her own thoroughbred dog. "Penny Fizz" is a Brussels Griffon, a Belgian dog similar in general appearance to a Pekinese.

China Is Warned To Resist Japan

Ch'so-ting Chi, Economist, Says A United Stand Is Key To Preservation

The immediate adoption by the Chinese Republic of a strong policy of resistance to Japan is "absolutely indispensable" if China is to preserve her political independence and sovereignty, Ch'so-ting Chi, Chinese economist and author, declared recently in New York, reports the New York Times.

Speaking at a luncheon of the Foreign Policy Association at the Hotel Astor, Dr. Chi asserted that such action, coupled with the discontinuance of the anti-Communist military campaign, would result in a united China which would be able to take its place with the nations of the world.

"In the complicated situation in China today one fact stands out above everything else; that is the increasing tendency toward national unity," he said. "Had this tendency been absent or less dominating, the kidnapping of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, which for a time seriously threatened civil war, would not have been settled the way it was.

Unity Held Hope of Nation

"This is the most powerful factor in China's national life today. In it lies the hope of the nation. It has expressed itself in popular hatred for civil war, the dissatisfaction over the continuation of the anti-Communist campaign and the unity of all parties and tendencies on the basis of a strong policy for resisting Japanese aggression."

Dr. Chi, together with Dr. Tsunechi Yu, Chinese Consul General, and Dr. Lin Yutang, Chinese author, spoke on the subject, "How Can China Achieve Unity?" More than 700 members of the association attended the luncheon.

While Dr. Chi contended that a strong anti-Japanese policy was necessary to unify China, Dr. Yutang held that the final unification of his country would be brought about by "a slow but real penetration of Western ideas of democracy. Dr. Yu, asserting that his nation had never been so united as it was at present, declared that the internal disturbances in his country were only the "necessary healthy signs of progress."

Would Accept Red Offer

Pointing out that the Japanese were able to "help themselves" in Manchuria and North China while government troops were engaged in fighting Communist armies during the last six years, Dr. Chi declared that it would be the "height of political wisdom for the National Government to accede to the proposal for internal peace and unity against Japan, which the Chinese Communists have made repeatedly, and devote the whole nation's energy to meet the emergency created by Japan's aggression."

While praising the work of General Chiang Kai-shek in unifying China, Dr. Yu-tang contended that the "forces of general enlightment" which, he said, are penetrating into Chinese political consciousness, would result in the final unification of his nation.

Dr. Yu asserted that the Chinese government had adopted a threefold policy of "self-preservation, self-defense and self help" by virtue of which it expected "not only to unite the country but also to defend and recover its sovereign rights."

Raymond Leslie Buell, president of the association, presided at the luncheon.

Eckener Confers On German-U.S. Airship Service

Immediate Objective Is To Have Hindenburg Make More Flights To U.S.

Prospects of regular scheduled air service across the Atlantic are moving promisingly toward early fruition on two fronts it was learned authoritatively recently at Washington, says the Christian Science Monitor, whose article follows:

In the field of heavier-than-air service protracted negotiations with Great Britain have taken a promising turn recently and most of many difficulties have been ironed out. The diplomatic difficulties which have long blocked the path are expected to be entirely removed within the next month or two. After that it will be merely a technical problem for the air lines.

Simultaneously, negotiations have been resumed with Germany over a service to be maintained with lighter-than-air dirigibles.

Dr. Eckener Confers

Dr. Hugo Eckener, world leader in this field of aviation, conferred at length here recently with officials of State, Navy and Commerce Departments. The immediate objective is permission for the Hindenburg to make more experimental fights between the United States and Germany as it did last year.

Behind this experimental service is the question of a joint German-American airship service. The suggestion has been made that an American company purchase the sister ship of the Hindenburg which is now under construction in Germany and operate it under the American flag in conjunction with the Hindenburg.

Some Difficulties

Major difficulty is the lack of an authority by Congress to the Post Office Department to employ such a ship as a mail carrier. There is also no legal provision for government aid in securing insurance on such a vessel as now prevails in record to sea-borne shipping.

Both of these obstacles are being considered carefully by the Department of Commerce and the new maritime commission and it is very possible that administration support may be thrown behind legislation to put airships on a parity with airplanes and water-borne shipping in the eyes of the law and in terms of government subsidy. Since an American company to operate the service has been established and since the Hindenburg has demonstrated the feasibility of such a service from the technical point of view, only the diplomatic problem would then remain.

Question About Flights

Some question has arisen regarding experimental flights by the Hindenburg this coming summer. Ten trips were made last summer and Dr. Eckener is understood to want permission to make the same number again this summer. However, there is a question where the line comes between experimental flights which are legal and regular scheduled service for which there is no legal basis.

Ten Flights

Ten flights a summer for the second year is considered here to be rather close to the borderline. There is also the fact that Dr. Eckener depended on the use of the navy's hangar and landing facilities at Lakehurst, N. J. This can be provided as an aid in experiments, but could not be so provided for commercial service.

The basic fact behind both situations is that the United States Government is prepared to permit a trans-Atlantic service only on a reciprocal basis. Thus there can be no commercial airship service with Germany until it is possible for an American company to operate alternate sailings with a German line.

This problem has been met in regard to heavier-than-air flying to England by the fact that Pan American Airways for the United States and Imperial Airways for British are about equally prepared technically to maintain such a service. Both have ships capable of the flight and both have experimented extensively with long-distance transoceanic flying.

Experimental Flights

Thus when the way is cleared of the diplomatic obstacles, both will be able to start at least experimental flights almost at once. The terms of the new agreement with Britain are still secret, but it is known that they will provide in general for a joint service to be maintained by the two lines mentioned with approximately the same number of flights by each.

Italian Army To Have More Higher Officers

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

ROME, Feb. 9—Proposals for increasing the number of higher officers of the Italian Army in order to meet the needs of national defense were approved at a cabinet meeting today, it was learned. The projected increase, it was explained, is designed to meet additional demands for higher officers due to "new types of weapons and present and future exigencies of the Italian Empire".

Sea Pact Leaves Italy Still Free To Aid Franco

Accord In Mediterranean Yields Balearic 'Rights,' Eases British Pressure

ROME.—No more dramatic or significant chapter in the post-war history of Europe has been written than that to which Count Galeazzo Ciano and Sir Eric Drummond added the final words, says the New York Herald Tribune. As the two diplomats signed the Mediterranean agreement they closed a two-year period of tension between England and Italy, during which Premier Benito Mussolini flouted the island kingdom, laughed at the League of Nations and created a new Italian empire by wiping Ethiopia off the map.

The Italian expansion at the expense of British interests was accomplished without Premier Mussolini's being attacked and is succeeded now by full British sanction and recognition. How much this means is best appreciated by the contrast between Rome of a year ago and Rome today.

A year ago Britain's whole naval strength was concentrated in the Mediterranean, operating from bases won from Italy's neighbors, and the Italians were sick with fear that British would impose oil sanctions. Today the Italians are cocky and happy again.

Italo-German Program Intact

In the Spanish question Premier Mussolini has yielded to England, but he has yielded less, perhaps, than public opinion has been led to believe. He has in no way yielded on the Italo-German program to create a Fascist Spain which will serve the national interests of both states.

Public opinion abroad has been led to believe that Mussolini, now in accord with England, would exert pressure on Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler for a more reasonable attitude toward Spain. But public opinion has been deceived once more, as, with the signature of the accord, Germany took an extraordinarily truculent note. While pocket-battleships shuttled up and down the Spanish coast, reports from Cadiz had 3,000 Italian "volunteers" in transit through Portugal for the Madrid front.

In the opinion of many, Germany and Italy are willing to risk another world war before they will let the Russian-supported Madrid government triumph. General Francisco Franco cannot win without foreign help, and Hitler and Mussolini cannot afford to have him lose.

Yields on Islands

It was not in the matter of Spanish intervention that Italy yielded to Britain. It was in the matter of the Balearic Islands. Those islands had been won from the loyalists and occupied by Italian marines under able leadership. Until Ciano and Drummond signed the pact, the islands were a de facto Italian base, just as truly as if Franco had signed the secret treaty which Primo De Rivera, the Spanish dictator, drafted with Mussolini in 1926 before England spiked this design for an Italian naval base.

Mussolini has yielded definitely here. He has engaged himself to maintain intact the territorial integrity of Spain. Those who profess to see machinations in all politics, and they include all professional diplomats, undoubtedly will conclude that this is typical Mussolini diplomacy, worked out as perfectly by Count Ciano as if Il Duce had conducted the strategy himself.

Although committed to seeing Franco through, Italy and Germany must be exceedingly careful with France and Britain, especially the latter. By threatening to take the Balearic Islands and then yielding in compromise, Ciano has made it easier for England to be conciliatory in dealing with Italian and German intervention on behalf of Franco.

In any event, diplomatic observers feel that Britain will do nothing now to prevent Mussolini and Hitler from carrying Franco to victory. If this contention is sound, then Ciano's maneuver has been successful, because what Italy needs from Spain is not so much a naval base in the Balearics as a friendly fascist state which would succor airplanes in time of crisis.

The naval base in the islands is the bargaining point for the diplomats, it being secretly understood that in the future Spain will welcome Italian air fleets refueling there.

The League of Nations has been destroyed and with it a whole era of peace pacts. They mean nothing today, and no better proof can be found than in the tone of those British circles which "The London Times" reflects editorially — the paper seems to say, like the Palmerstonian notes:

"London Times" Comment

"Look here, you chaps, you have gotten rather the better of us, and we are worried about Spain, too, and we will sign your jolly little agreement, but don't think for one moment that the implications for the future of the empire, which are plain in your conquest of Ethiopia, are admitted or accepted by us."

Britain is rearming night and day. As "The Times" editorial suggests Ethiopia's conquest was a defeat for the League and for the empire, but it was only one battle in a long campaign.

British Buy Diamond That Brings Good Luck

LONDON.—A nineteen-carat diamond, valued at $60,000, which is said to be the luckiest stone in the world, has been purchased by a group in England.

Unlike the famous Hope diamond of ill omen, which is a greenish-blue color, the "lucky" diamond is rosy-pink. It is credited with the power of warding off ill health.

When Azon Barbara, of Paris, bought it 100 years ago, he was suffering from an apparently incurable disease. Immediately after it came into his possession, his health improved, and during the next twenty-eight years of his life he never had an illness.

Since then it has been handed down from generation to generation, and it has always held the same charm.

A short time ago, the sole survivor of the family sold it.

Airplanes Win In Theory But Fail In Practice

Force wrote a series of articles, "The War of 19—."

His idea was that defensive tactics on sea and land had relegated offensive tactics to military limbo and that offensive warfare is supreme only in the air. He concluded:

1. Defensive action against aerial bombardment is wasted.

2. All aerial preparation for war should be limited to producing bombers, a purely offensive class of aviation.

War, he pointed out, is fought by a nation using all its resources—naval, military, industrial, political. Without industrial support, fighting would be impossible; hence, industrial centers are legitimate targets.

Air-forces, he held, are the only weapons able to move without restriction, the only offensive arm with naval and military services able only to hold the line. So:

"We must group together all the forces of the nation in order to mass in that domain where the decision can be obtained—in the air. I have therefore launched the new doctrine on the principle—'Resist on the surface to mass in the air'."

Hitting Power

Air power, said he, means hitting power, blood and thunder destruction. Don't seek the enemy in great expanses of sky—find him on his homegrounds, kill war-birds in their nests. Don't bomb troops in dugouts—destroy the factories supplying those doughboys with rifles and bullets.

Douhetism means showering industrial and political areas with bombs, thus breaking down national resistance and destroying the people's will to wage war.

Air officers all over the world began to say that General Douhet's Machiavellian logic was unassailable.

In Germany, the late Gen. Hans von Seeckt, Reichswehr creator, put a new twist into Douhetism for a nation Versailles-bound then not to build an air-force. Whereas, the Italian would fly over the enemy's head to raid his cities, the German would drive as a whirlwind across his frontiers, smashing through pillboxes and concrete forts with tanks and armored cars.

Terror

In both cases, "frightfulness" was the capstone of the new warfare. Both strategists were sure that one Cyclopean blow would fell a nation to its knees, pleading for peace at any price. Aviation factories began developing bombers to cruise 1,700 miles. Italy created a mastodon that could drop a 3,000-pound aerial torpedo anywhere along the Mediterranean.

Superimpose a map of Europe on a map of the United States, with Berlin over Chicago. Then, Leningrad is at Boston, Constantinople at Miami, Rome at New Orleans, Paris at Wichita, and London at Omaha. Europe's great Capitals fall east of the Rockies, eight hours by air from east to west. All Germany's planes could cross the French border before the airmail to the Pacific Coast had turned up and left Newark.

Thus, too Germany may threaten Metz, Strasbourg and Nancy, France is equally dangerous to Essen, Coblenz and Cologne. Bombing one means frightful reprisal against the other. There you have it: Aviation turned out to be a Frankenstein monster, devouring itself.

In other words, General Douhet was "almost" right. Then only defense against aircraft is more aircraft. Guns may keep bombers above 20,000 feet, making it difficult for them to hit targets, but bombers can not be overtaken and destroyed unless pursuit-planes are immensely superior in armament and speed which is not the case now.

Navalists, however, are looking askance at growing aerial might. In the current Aero Digest, Cy Caldwell points out:

"As a defense against air power the British Navy may be dismissed in a paragraph. Save for its air component, it will be ineffective. . . . The Fleet itself can not survive unless it moves out into the open sea, hundreds of miles from England.

"This was amply demonstrated during the Italian conquest of Ethiopia, rendered possible solely by air power. . . . The winning of the war actually was made possible by the mere threat of air power which was never used.

"Without the threat of the Italian Air Force in Italy against the British Fleet in the Mediterranean, England would have closed the Suez Canal . . . and the Italians would have been left stranded in Ethiopia."

Army-Navy

Another who believes airplanes doom war-ships is Boake Carter, ace radio commentator and former British Royal Flying Corps airman. In a "story of events . . . within recent weeks," he told how an Army and Navy bomb vs. battleship argument drew in "a third man, a high Washington official." Both officers asked:

"'Get us an old ship and let's settle the argument.' The high official put the proposal up to Navy bigwigs. It touched a tender spot—and they balked at offering a ship—but countered with the recommendation of a target to be towed behind a battle-ship. This was agreed upon.

"Some days later, a telephone rang in the G.H.Q. air-force of the Army. The airmen were informed that somewhere off the Virginia coast, within a certain specified area from 25 to 150 miles at sea, were two battle-ships, one towing a target 1,000 yards astern.

"'The target represents the enemy, the Army Air Corps was told. 'You find him and bomb him.' The Navy chuckled. The indefiniteness of information made it hard enough. Just to make it harder still—the Navy's target towed by the battleship was a mere eight feet by twelve feet in area, ninety-six square feet, the size of a small floor in a small room in a small house.

"Well, Army observers went out. They picked up the battle-ships. They wired back to their land base the longitude and latitude, course and speed of the two ships. Upon receipt of that information, the bombers of the Army set out, went straight to the mark and coolly blew the target out of the water.

"They couldn't see it, but they knew where it was because of the white wake it created as it dragged through the saltwater of the Atlantic. Sixty to 75 per cent of their bombs were hits and they performed this feat at 8,000 and 14,000 feet.

Argentine Pact On U.S. Trade Thought Near

voyage to Buenos Aires, an Argentine conversion loan of $23,500,000 was heavily oversubscribed in New York a short time after it was offered.

Trade off Greatly

But trading between the two countries has fallen. Tariff barriers and sanitary restrictions designed to protect national markets are responsible. These measures have decreased the flow of Argentine meat, grains, hides and fruits to the United States, while formerly heavy shipments from the United States of machinery, automobiles, radios and other manufactured goods have decreased.

In 1928, for example, the United States imported 500,000 tons of Argentine linseed. This figure dropped to about 200,000 in 1935, although last year improvement was noted because of the short linseed crop in the United States.

Some quarters hope that Mr. Roosevelt will seek to remove such barriers as the tax of 25 cents a bushel on Argentine corn entering the United States and the provisions of the tariff act that prohibit the entry of Argentine meat from districts declared to be affected by aftosa. The sanitary convention between Argentina and the United States, for which the Roosevelt administration is seeking approval, would remedy the latter situation.

It is pointed out here that Argentina does not wish to flood the meat or grain markets of the United States, and actually would never be in position to do so. A small percentage of the meat, grain and hide trade of North America would be sufficient to satisfy the local producers.

Canada Heads Toward Shift In Tax System

Ottawa, Provinces, Cities Wrangle Over Spheres, Move To Centralization

TORONTO, Jan. 16—Latest evidence of an approaching showdown on Canadian taxation problems, with reorganization of the whole tax structure indicated, is the action of the Ontario government to retain all revenues from the provincial income tax instead of rebating part of this revenue to the municipalities, as it did last year.

In return, the government will relieve the municipalities of the necessity of paying toward the costs of old-age pensions and mothers' allowances, and will carry the full cost of these social services.

Retroactive legislation were introduced at the Ontario legislative session recently. Provincial income tax at present disbursed among the municipalities amounts to $2,248,000, and it is estimated the cost of the new social welfare policy will be about $3,000,000. The Dominion government now pays 75 per cent of old-age pension costs, the province 15 per cent and the municipalities 10 per cent. The provinces and municipalities pay the total cost of the mothers' allowances on a 50-50 basis.

Want Burden on Income

The government is expressing its belief that the income taxpayers should bear as far as possible the cost of the social services, it was reported by D. M. Halliday to the N.Y. Herald Tribune. It aims to lift some of the burden from the municipalities, so that they, in turn, may reduce taxation on real estate.

The depression has increased the number of pensioners of both classes. When old-age pensions first appeared the highest possible peak was placed at 23,000, but at present there are 55,000, involving an Ontario expenditure of more than $12,000,000.

This move shows a trend toward centralization of revenue collection, which began last year, when the Dominion government assumed the cost of collecting both federal and provincial income taxes, with considerable economy.

Tax Powers Definite

Under the British North American act, forming the basis of Canada's constitution, raising of money by any mode of taxation was a power assigned to the Dominion Parliament. Under Section 92 of the act direct taxation within the province was a power given to the legislatures of each province. Revenues, notably the customs duties, which had previously accrued to the provinces, were transferred to the Dominion, and in turn, Ottawa became responsible for the provincial debts and agreed to pay annual subsidies for the support of provincial legislatures.

Costs of social service which were not visioned in 1867 by the Fathers of Confederation—unemployment relief being the chief one—have increased steadily in recent years, while Dominion subsidies and grants have not kept pace.

The provinces are making a strong bid for a proportionate allotment of the $90,000,000 which the income tax pours into the federal treasury, apart from Ontario's own impost, which is refunded by Ottawa, claiming that in its collection the Dominion is invading the taxation sources given them under the B.N.A. act. The even more productive 8 per cent sales tax is regarded as another direct levy which should be left to the provinces. With an estimated revenue of $120,000,000 from this source, these two taxes account for more than half the federal income this year.

So far, the Dominion has refused to yield, arguing that its present grants-in-aid for relief, its contributions to social legislation and subsidies have been exceedingly generous. Quebec is ardently pressing for a share of the federal income tax; Premier Maurice L. Duplessis at the same time is reported opposed to following Ontario's lead in imposing a provincial income tax.

Increases Asked

Manitoba and Saskatchewan are soliciting subsidy increases from the Dominion government. Taxation problems are the reason for these requests.

While the Ontario government says that, of 940 municipalities, 935 would profit by the decision to retain provincial income revenue and in turn pay pension costs, a bitter outcry has been raised in Toronto, center of Ontario business life, which is "out" about $470,000, or half a mill of taxation, against what is termed the unfair burden placed on real estate. The city may be obliged to cancel the partial assessment exemption now granted to small homeowners, or reduce relief allowances.

Most encouraging progress toward solution of these taxation perplexities facing federal, provincial and municipal authorities alike may be expected to originate in the National Finance Committee set up by Minister of Finance Charles A. Dunning, with proposals forthcoming for simplified and equitable distribution which could be implemented by Parliament and provincial legislature alike.

Patience

During the first evening of a visit to her daughter at Sea Point an elderly woman who had never seen the sea before was found intently watching the Robben Island lighthouse. "What infinite patience sailors have," she observed, noticing that she was no longer alone.

"Why?" asked her daughter.

"Well," she replied, "the wind has blown that light out 38 times since I've been watching, and each time they relighted it."—Calgary (Alta.) Herald.

Berlin Catholics Defy Nazi Threat

Diocesan Journal Says It Will Not Keep Peace As Long As Attacks Are Made

The Berlin Catholic Diocesan Journal challenged the State and the National Socialist party recently with the declaration that until the semi-official attacks on Christianity cease the Catholic will continue to protest and counterattack, says a dispatch to the New York Times.

"The clergy and the church press much refrain from politics," it says. "We ask, however, when will the political press, for example the Black Corps, cease public attacks on Christianity and the church? As long as these continue we refuse to keep the peace.

"The Black Corps (the Hitler special Guards official organ) has often called attention to the fact that it is not anybody's private paper but an official organ. We feel ourselves called on to demand whether such an organ has the right to make such declarations and to what extent they are to be understood as manifestoes. That is a very serious question which has nothing to do with so-called confessional differences of opinion."

Referring to the Catholic stand, the Diocesan Journal says:

"If this ideology of the Black Corps is to be regarded as the sole ideology for Germans, then we shall truly be thrown into a chaos of principles and opinions which will threaten our very existence.

"Let there be no doubt. Millions of truly Christian Germans cannot be forced to accept the Black Corps ideology either in the centuries of struggle or by the sword and whip, as the Black Corps asserts the Christian religion was forced on the Germans."

Aimed cautiously at a single party organ, the Catholic challenge is, in fact, issued publicly to the whole tendency of the Hitler special guards and the secret political police, representing the most active and most radical elements in the National Socialist party. It appears in a long article discussing the most recent Black Corps attacks on Christianity.

Himmler Threatens Foes

Heinrich Himmler, commander of the Hitler special guards and chief of the political police, in a national broadcast praising police work, answered the clergy of both confessions.

"We will seek out and persecute," he said, "all those reactionaries or confessional scolds who for one petty reason or another—because this or that institution does not suit them—think they must be opponents to Hitler's State or think they dare to be."

The "confessional scolds" were grouped with reactionaries and communists in "enemies of the State."

Mr. Himmler announced that in the future all police officers would be recruited from the ranks of the Hitler Special Guard.

Youth Plans Are Planned

Despite the optimistic statement in December by Baldur von Schlarch, Reich Youth Leader, declaring that all differences between the Hitler Youth and the church were over, both the Catholic and Protestant churches are expected to make new appeals to the government on the youth question in the near future.

The Catholic archbishops and other leading members of the Episcopate, meeting at Fulda, probably will draw up a set of complaints with which they will approach the government in the hope of reaching a compromise.

In the meantime the Hitler Youth leaders are trying to convince the public that all is well in the relations between the State youth organizations and the churches. Such a campaign had been expected as an inevitable accompaniment of the amalgamation of all the former Christian youth groups with the State youth, but the fact remains that Mr. von Schirach and other youth leaders have become identified in church people's minds with paganism.

A Hitler Youth group leader, Guenther Kauffman, writing in the Tageblatt, asserts:

"It is true that a number of youth training possibilities such as sport have been taken away from the clergy. However, both the Protestant and the Catholic churches should be glad of these changes we have made. A free Sunday is guaranteed them.

"We would like them to weigh the worldly advantage of the former situation against the younger generation's degeneration and materialism as it was then subject to Bolshevist and atheist propaganda and the like."

$14,350 In Gold Is Stolen From Pouch On Liner

Ingot, Size Of A Brick, Taken From Ship On Way To New York From Paris

An ingot of solid gold—$14,350 of value in a bar somewhat smaller than an ordinary paving brick—vanished from the French liner Paris under mysterious circumstances during the ship's voyage to New York recently. The loss of the precious metal was revealed only after the liner had put back to sea on her return trip to Paris, says the New York Herald Tribune, whose story of January 17 follows:

A slashed canvas mail sack bore mute witness to the manner in which the ingot disappeared. But the thief wasn't greedy. A twin brother of the gold bar rested undisturbed in the ripped pouch, and piled near by were thirty-nine other sacks full of gold. The entire shipment included 421 ingots valued at $6,000,000.

First reports that the gold had been removed from the strongroom of the Paris proved incorrect. The shipment had been mailed as ordinary parcel post, without registration or postal insurance. The forty pouches or gold made the trip in hatch No. 1, along with 248 other sacks of parcel post mail, French Line agents reported. But that hold was under the control of the sergeant-at-arms and was presumably locked against intruders throughout the voyage.

After a stormy voyage, the Paris arrived in Quarantine last Wednesday night and lay there for twelve hours in a dense fog, unable to dock until Thursday noon. It would have been easy for a small boat to approach the liner unobserved and to receive the stolen ingot, but the authorities were inclined to rule that possibility out because of the carefully timed planning that would have been required of two or more confederates, who could hardly have counted on the help of fog for the transfer.

The mail pouch showed an eight-inch slit which looked as if it had been made at least two days before with a sharp knife or a razor. It was discovered Thursday afternoon by an employe of the Hendrickson Transfer Company, which was assigned to pick up the parcel post at the pier and deliver it to United States postal officials.

The truckmen, noticing the condition of the sack, refused to accept and sign for it. Examination revealed that it should have contained two ingots instead of one.

All 421 bars of gold were consigned ultimately to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, but eighty-one of them, sent by the Swiss Banking Company, of Zurich, Switzerland, were addressed to the Irving Trust Company, which was to act as the Swiss bank's agent in receiving the gold and turning it over to the Reserve Bank. The missing bar was one of this group. Word of the loss was sent to the bank and to the Swiss firm which insured the shipment.

Postal authorities and police began investigations but were informed by the United States Attorney's office that the case apparently was entirely under French jurisdiction. The French Line was understood to have retained private detectives to trace the missing ingot.

One possibility considered by the authorities was that a member of the Paris's crew had managed to get at the sack, remove the bar of soft, heavy metal, and conceal it somewhere on the ship, hoping to smuggle it off at some future time. Another theory was that the sack had been robbed in transit between Zurich and Le Havre, and that the postal checkers had failed to notice the rip when the pouch was loaded for the westward trip.

A thorough search of the Paris on Friday failed to turn up the lost gold. Late that night Customs Guards halted a steward and discovered that the man was attempting to leave Pier 88, West Forty-eighth Street, with two cans containing heroin. Another can was discovered in his locker on board the ship. He and another steward were arrested on drug charges and questioned about the missing ingot, but could shed no light on the case. Their names were not given out. French police and postal authorities, who have jurisdiction in the case, are expected to make a thorough search when the Paris reaches Le Havre on January 23.

If a seaman purloined the ingot and then grew panicky at the prospect of discovery, he may have jettisoned the bar, in which case the answer to the mystery is safe on the floor of the Atlantic Ocean, somewhere along the winter steamer track.

But even if the thief has succeeded in getting his loot away, he must face the big question of what to do with it. Last year France, the Netherlands and Switzerland, last strongholds of the gold standard, abandoned free trading in the metal, and there is no agency remaining where a private individual can walk in with a $14,000 gold brick and sell it without answering a few pertinent questions.

Ever since the World War gold has crossed the ocean in quantities ranging up to $50,000,000 in a single ship, and no cases of successful theft have been reported, but these shipments of bullion paid an extremely high freight rate and traveled in steel strong rooms aboard the ships. In the last year the idea of sending gold by parcel post mail has gained favor because it is somewhat cheaper. Small shipments have arrived from South America and Central America, and others from Europe, but the consignment of 421 bars on the Paris last week attracted attention in financial circles because of its size.

For shipment by parcel post each bar of gold was cased individually in a wooden box fifteen inches long and four inches square on the end. A box of this type vanished with the lost ingot.

The ingot weighed 400 ounces—33.3 pounds in the troy scale or nearly 28 pounds avoirdupois. With its box it must have made a hefty package for the thief, and may have convinced him that one bar was all he could manage.

A curious sidelight on the case was the report filed at the West Forty-seventh Street police station, which said that a box containing "an unknown metal" was missing and set the value at 350 francs. That report apparently was given because of the parcel post status of the package, and 350 francs (about $16.50) may be the maximum value allowed for such a package in the mails.

Calm Thinking In Washington On Air Mishaps

Senate Committee To Investigate Thoroughly Recent Accidents

Some very calm and careful thinking—and also a certain amount of hysteria mixed up with politics—have been the result in government and congressional quarters in Washington of the recent disturbing succession of commercial airline accidents, says the Christian Science Monitor.

The public aftermath has been twofold. Senator Royal S. Copeland, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, has announced that his committee will investigate thoroughly the accidents. The Department of Commerce has summoned representatives of all the commercial airlines to a safety conference to be held here in February.

These moves, frankly, amount to little more than an effort to meet the public demand for action in the face of a series of accidents which would appear to laymen to indicate that blame can be attributed somewhere—either to the government's machinery for improving safety in the air or to the lines themselves and their equipment.

A feature is the perfectly understandable desire on both sides involved to escape blame—if such there be. It is at this point that politics enters in—with pressure being brought on interested members of Congress to take action which by implication at least would tend to clear the air lines of the blame and throw it on the Bureau of Air Commerce.

At the same time the officials of that organization, already afflicted with what might almost be termed a persecution complex from previous brushes with the airlines and Congress, find it difficult to restrain themselves from heated public statements.

Real Problem Assessed

Behind this surface tension, the real problem is being assessed dispassionately. As yet no conclusions are advanced. Investigations of the most recent accidents are not yet complete. But certain broad generalizations as to American commercial aviation and the safety factor are being made.

Here are the known facts: After a long period of comparative freedom from accidents commercial aviation has had a very bad month. Beginning with Dec. 15 there have been five accidents with commercial planes in which 15 passengers and eight employes of the air lines have been killed. In one of the accidents there was no fatality. This occurred in the December 19 crash of an Eastern Air Lines plane near Port Jervis, New York. It is to be noted that this line has not had a passenger fatality in over 10 years.

Other Accidents

On the previous day, Dec. 18, Northwest Air Lines lost a plane in Idaho with only two pilots on board. That line also can still claim that in over 10 years it has not lost a passenger.

Western Air Express, which has had a splendid record for years, suffered most, losing two planes one on Dec. 15 and one on Jan. 12. The first of these has never been found. The second involved the fatality to the well-known African explorer, Martin Johnson. The fifth accident was to a United Air Lines plane, another line with good past record.

In not a single one of these cases is there yet an indication of a breakdown in the aids to air navigation, such as radio beams, beacon lights or air traffic control. So far as is known, there was also no structural failure in any of the planes. Further, weather was not a serious factor.

Human Element Involved

Indications are, therefore, that the fault probably lies somewhere in that general field known as the human element. Was the pilot overconfident? Did he fail to use as fully as possible the mechanical aids which have been devised? Or on the other hand was he putting too much reliance on them and forgetting that they are fallible.

To observers all of this proves only one thing, which is not new. It is that, so far, it has proved impossible to work out a perfect relationship between the human mind and machinery. This problem is not peculiar to aviation It applies to railroads, ships and automobiles. It certainly does not prove that aviation should be abandoned.

The public demand for an explanation and a fixing of blame in the case of the accidents results, again following the line of thought behind the scenes, primarily from a tendency to represent the degree of safety in the air as something more than it actually is.

as a double tailskid unit in airport landings. Each wheel likewise is provided with a conventional hydraulic shock absorber strut.

The tail of each pontoon is fitted with a small caster to eliminate wear on the pontoon itself when the after sections are called on to do tail-skid duty. The main section of each pontoon is rigidly attached by struts to the body of the airplane, as in standard seaplane practice.

An order for design and construction of the new float gear was placed by John H. Geisse, chief of the Bureau of Air Commerce's development section, as part of the government's program to encourage private flying. The fundamental idea of the floats has been under development by the Edo organization for five years.

'Speed-Up' Plan Held Real Cause Of Auto Strike

DETROIT, Jan. 11—The "speed-up," probably the most common grievance of workers in mass-production industry, already appears half settled in the General Motors Corporation automobile strike.

The question is embodied in two of the eight demands of the auto workers' union.

The workers' complaint is described by union officials as excessive demands for output, which, they claim, wears men out and eventually makes them unable to keep the pace of the industry.

The management, on the other hand, declares the policy of the industry is continually to install machinery to reduce physical effort. "The less physical exertion, the greater the output," says one of the principal plant executives in Detroit. "That, I feel, is a law."

Wherever the merits lie, the speed-up is associated with the piecework method of pay, whereby workers are offered a bonus to increase production.

Company Meets Requests

"Once you have eradicated piecework or the group bonus plan (piecework on the basis of an agreeing group of workers, rather than on the individual alone), you have taken out 60 per cent of the speedup system," states Ed. Hall, a vice-president of the United Automobile Workers of America.

General Motors' willingness to discard piecework wherever its workers request such action, indicates that the company has made an important advance toward removing this proverbial source of restlessness. In process of turning to the hourly rate of pay in preference to piece work, General Motors at present is making only 40 per cent of its cars on piecework pay.

The speed-up problem grows out of the machine.

"We want to run the machines and not the machines to run us," cried an orator at the big union meeting at Flint, Mich., a week ago. The applause he got was genuine. There is indubitable uneasiness among auto workers about the characteristic push for production of the industry and about mechanical efficiency.

Union spokesmen say the assembly line or the conveyor generally is not speeded up so fast as to hurl more work at employes than they can reasonably handle. The speed-up, as outlined by Mr. Hall, is this: Beginning production on a new car with, say, 500 workers on an assembly line and at low pay; offering extra pay for high production; as the days progress, taking 10 men off the line here and 10 off there, and splitting their wages among the men left; stimulating men to work beyond their capacity through continued offer of bonus; and finally reducing the original 500 workers on the line to 400, who have received a big jump in pay and are grinding themselves down to earn it.

More Time Given

Such a picture is a misconception, retorts the management, of what actually occurs on the assembly line.

The speed-up is not universal through the industry, union chiefs concede. Several plants producing higher-priced cars they dub "old ladies' homes." Demand for such cars is lighter, the line moves more slowly, the workers on the line have more space between them, and precision counts more.

Outcry against the speed-up is heard oftenest in plants producing the most popular cheap cars, where demand is enormous and need for supply greatest.

"When I started on the line eight years ago, I was handling 50 engines a day," remarked a union man in the Chevrolet engine factory at Flint. "Last year I did my bit on 200 engines a day, and this year they are giving us 250. What gets me is the boost from 200 to 250. That's what I call speed-up."

Increase in the units of work a man handles may be made possible by new machinery, it is commented within the industry. It also is granted that occasionally a foreman may misjudge for a time the capacity of his men.

"The line is timed for the average man," asserts a leading official of management. "The laggard can't keep up and thinks it is going too fast. Fifteen per cent of the time is allowed for individual relief, such as getting a glass of water, etc."

Part of the discontent with speed-up is due to the pressure of the manufacturing system, with its necessary discipline and regular, inevitable demand for tasks to be done, according to a view among manufacturers. Everything in a plant has to be synchronized.

Synchronized System

In an investment of $30,000,000 or more, $500,000 worth of machinery here cannot be kept waiting for materials from there. All has to be timed so the entire organization works on a schedule as a single mechanism.

The truth about the "speed-up" of course involves what does happen to men after the age of 40. There are fewer men over 40 in the automobile industry than in any other, it is granted by automobile statisticians. They say the youth of the industry is one explanation, declaring that the proportion of older employes is increasing, according to figures from the last two federal census compiled by the Automobile Manufacturers Association.

Men workers of 45 years and over in auto factories in 1930 comprised 20 per cent of the total. This cuts below the average for all manufacturing and mechanical industries, which was 27.2 per cent.

Average Age 36.2 Years

The average age of all male factory employes in automobile and body plants in the model year 1935-36 was 36.2 years, and their average years of service four and four tenths, it is reported by Andrew T. Court, of the economic research department of the manufacturers' association.

Here again the situation is spotty. Some of the older auto companies with a lesser demand for cars are regarded among the auto workers as having more older men. On the other hand, welfare workers relate that they have come across cases of men who have been permanently laid off after reaching 40.

Views on Speed-up

Justified or distorted, the speedup problem is here amplified in the following interviews with spokesmen for management:

Mr. Hall: "Men will sacrifice their own physical being to get enough money to keep their families. This is true of every automobile plant that has piecework or group system of pay.

"At the start of production on a new model, the men are not as adept as they will be. The company will stand for a certain need of workers familiarizing themselves with their new jobs. It must be done. Some extra men may be required on the line at the start.

"Workers sense their responsibility to get out a certain amount of work. Labor accepts that responsibility.

"In the Nash automobile plant, which is the only one to be unionized 100 per cent—no man can work there unless he belongs to the union—we have asked for the discharge of men for inability to produce, for coming in drunk and for refusing to do their job as they should.

"We accept an equal responsibility with management for efficiency, safety and production where we are given that privilege. That's been proven. I can mention a string of agreements in parts plants.

"Every once in a while a company will jack up the assembly line a little. But that is the small part of the speed-up.

"They start right out on a new model with full production. So the only way they can speed up is by reduction of force. At the start of production one man may be doing one operation. Before he gets through he may be doing five."

Definition Given

Mr. Hall then gave his definition of the speed-up. "Reduction of manpower per operation," he said, "constitutes the speed-up." He added, "That's the bulk of it."

"There is too much pressure on the men," he continued. "They realize their homes and their financial responsibility, and they will take it out of themselves to make the money. That is why 75 per cent of the men are thrown on the scrap heap at 40.

"This is not a matter of saving jobs. That must come through reduction of hours, the only way unemployment can be alleviated.

"The question ties in with piecework. Chrysler is using the hourly rate of pay. Nash is on piece-work. But at Nash we don't worry ho much about piece-work.

"The speed of the lines and reduction of men are all taken into consideration with a committee of the men. No increase in the speed of the line is made, no reduction or increase is carried out without a discussion between a committee of the workers and the management.

"When you have such cooperation, you don't need to bother about how the men will be paid. You know they will be treated right.

"If the committee doesn't agree that a man will come off the line, he doesn't. If there is no agreement between the committee and the management, the status quo continues. Where each side has the confidence of the other, these things can be honestly worked out. It can be done only by genuine collective bargaining.

"We take a certain responsibility, as I said, for good workmanship, efficiency, etc. We can't take this unless we control all the men, as we do at Nash. Our organization is just as much interested in the welfare of that company as its board of directors. We have reduced enormously its overhead, waste, its costs of operation."

A Forgotten King

Among the many colorful and interesting postal issues of Greece up to the year 1936 one will search in vain for one showing the picture of any member of the Greek royal family. There are stamps showing the art treasures of ancient Hellas, stamps honoring the Greek patriots who fought against the Turks, and even a stamp with a portrait of the English poet, Lord Byron, but until the appearance of the stamp pictured above, belatedly honoring King Constantine who died in exile in 1923 Greek postage stamps have never borne the likeness of a Greek monarch.

It has been suggested that this may have been due to the fact that for the last hundred years the rulers of this country have been foreigners. For two-thirds of a century the kings of Greece have been drawn from the Danish family of Glucksburg. These Glucksburgs were first invited to Greece in 1683 when the previous king, Otto of Bavaria, had been deposed as unsatisfactory. Somewhat more fortunate than Otto, George Blucksburg managed to remain on his precarious throne until his assassination in 1913 during an ill-timed visit to Salonika. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Constantine who was born in 1868.

This ill-starred monarch, beset by revolutions, faced with participation in the World War and by another with Turkey, was deposed from the throne, recalled and again deposed a second time in 1922. He died in exile a year later in Italy.

In 1924 Greece proclaimed to the world that henceforth she would be known as the Hellenic Republic. Constantine's son, George II who had succeeded his father, was sent into exile, and for eleven years the royal palace at Athens remained deserted. In 1933 a military coup d'etat abolished the republic and restored George II as King of the Hellenes. Today a Glucksburg is once more upon the throne of Greece, and the ashes of the unfortunate Constantine have recently been returned to his former kingdom. It is in commoration of this latter event that the black-bordered mourning stamp has been issued.

In connection with the Fourth American-Hispano Postal Congress, the little Central American republic of Panama has recently issued an imposing series of 26 regular and airmail stamps.

The 10c orange airmail shows an allegorical tablet representing the symbolic union of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans by the Panama Canal. The 50c orange shows a typical scene on the Canal—the famous Gaillard Cut. An airplane view of Panama City appears on the 20c red airmail stamp, and the 5c blue shows a portrait of Simon Bolivar, the great revolutionary hero to whom many of the countries of South America owe their liberation from Spain.

Holland is known to the world not only for its dikes, its tulips and its windmills, but also for the highly original and frequently amusing designs that appear on its annual child welfare stamps.

Two recent issues from Holland and from the Dutch East Indies add to this collection. On one a flying cherub is blowing on a post horn, and on the other a child is being coaxed to eat the cereal which is provided daily to poor children by the Dutch Salvation Army.

The values of the first stamp are $1\frac{1}{2}+1\frac{1}{2}$ dark gray, $5c+3c$ blue-geen, $6\frac{3}{4}+4c$ orange-brown, and $12\frac{1}{2}+3\frac{1}{2}$ dull blue. The values of the Dutch East Indies issue are: $2c+1c$ violet lake, $5c+2\frac{1}{2}c$ indigo black, $2\frac{1}{2}+2\frac{1}{2}c$ deep violet, $12\frac{1}{2}c+2\frac{1}{2}c$ red arange, and $15c+5c$ ultramarine. The coat of arms at the right of this last stamp is the insignia of the Dutch army with its motto of "Blood and Fire."

Eight semi-postal stamps have been issued by Belgium with the portrait of Crown Prince Baudouin. The values are: $10c+5c$ yellow brown, $25c+5c$ purple, $35c+5c$ deep green, $50c+5c$ brown, $70c+5c$ olive, $1fr+25c$ carmine rose, $1.75fr+25c$ ultramarine, and the $2.45fr+2.55fr$ violet.

Prince Baudouin is the eldest son of King Leopold and the late Queen Astrid. His unusual name is the French form of 'Baldwin,' and the present Crown Prince of Belgium was probably named after Baudouin Brasde-Fer, the first Count of Flanders.

Bit Of All Right

A poor, illiterate, weedy newspaper seller had been sentenced to death. In Pentonville, he was taken ill and had to be carefully nursed back to health in order that he should be well enough to be hanged. But on his first day out of hospital a reprieve arrived.

It was feared that the excitement of the news might be fatal to him in his weak state of health. The padre was entrusted with the task of breaking it to him with the necessary gentleness.

The convalescent, very weak, was sitting on a wall, smoking, when the padre found him.

"Well, my boy," said he, "I've got a bit of good news for you."

"Oh?" said the prisoner.

"Yes. I saw the sheriff as I came in."

"Ah?" said the prisoner.

"He had come with a special message from the Home Secretary," went on the padre, feeling his way carefully. "It was a message you've been waiting to hear for a long time."

"I have?" said the prisoner, showing a faint curiosity.

"Yest, Now, steady, my boy! Keep calm. It's a reprieve! You're not going to be hanged. They've changed the sentence to penal servitude."

The padre stood ready to catch the man in his arms, should his agitation overcome him. But the prisoner's sole comment, as he replaced the cigarette in his mouth, was:

"Blimey, guv'nor! That's a bit of all right, ain't it?"

Make the Most of Winter

Cold Weather Peps You Up; Winter Offers A Thousand Chances For Sport; But Don't Overdo

By VICTOR G. HEISER, M.D.

Collier's

The favorite winter sport of a salamander like myself, who has long lived in the tropics, is, I must admit, sitting comfortably in a warm room as near as possible to a blazing fire. There, while toasting myself I can meditate on the Gloucester fishermen, enduring almost unbelievable hardship and cold on the Grand Banks, with numb fingers endlessly hauling in the mighty cod, making their way home on ships hardly distinguishable from icebergs. Or I remember the sympathy I felt in contemplating a certain Spartan baptism.

On the edge of an oblong hole, cut through the deep ice, stood a sheet-draped sinner, a stalwart "brother" on either side. "Zip!" down he was plunged and over his head closed the freezing water.

"Do you believe?" rang out in the frosty air.

"I b-b-b-elieve," he chattered.

Though he and his fellow converts were actually covered with a thin film of ice apparently these immersions were attended by no fatalities. The effect was little more than that of a super-cold bath; most people prefer to harden themselves in the tub.

The human body can accustom itself to almost anything, but the process must be gradual. The fisherman can chop ice off his beard and come to no harm; nevertheless, wet feet, to one who is not accustomed to them, may constitute a danger. The undergraduates on any northern college campus, inured to all weathers, wander hatless from laboratory to lecture hall. They suffer no ill effects. They may have to rub their ears, but their well-nourished scalps through which the blood courses more freely will not even tingle.

I admire these young people though I do not emulate them 100 per cent—as yet.

When I was a boy at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, and something of a polar bear because of my environment, I recall the delight with which I fished through the ice at night, holding a light over the dark water, and jabbling with pronged spear all curious fish which came into view, and rubbing my feet with snow when they became frostbitten. But now my system, which has become used to intense heat, must be accustomed gradually to new conditions. This I intend to do, sacrificing comfort to health.

I find that I am not the only one who shiver with distaste at the approach of Jack Frost. Man is prone to forget what is unpleasant. Nevertheless, we cannot abandon with impunity the fundamental recipes for health; certain rules must be followed winter or summer.

Human experience, the world over, agrees that cold is a mental and physical stimulant. Why this is so, nobody has explained to the satisfaction of scientists. It may have something to do with metabolism, that mysterious process by which nature changes what we eat in assimilable forms—sugar into glucose and proteins into amino acids. Metabolism has to saw up the wood so that it will fit into the furnace which keeps the body fires going.

Watch the Calorie Count

When the mercury stands at twenty or below, the system needs more fuel to warm up the skin and respiratory tract than in summer when blood and air temperatures are not far apart. Therefore, to get an adequate number of calories, include plenty of fat in your winter diet. Take a leaf out of the health manual of the illiterate Eskimo who, in his wisdom, making a virtue of necessary, actually enjoys his tallow and blubber. Winter is a field day for the hearty eater. But even he must restrain his enthusiasms. The vigorous country week ends are no more. Instead, he lies abed on torpid Sunday mornings, and consumes too large dinners. Each holiday—Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's—is a hurdle in his race for health. By such indulgences he accumulates an additional heavy burden of toxins to dispose of.

Too much food and too little exercise are not alone responsible for the well-known fact that constipation becomes more serious in winter. The water intake which promotes peristalsis naturally falls off. In the summer dog days your skin must be kept cool with perspiration, and thirst is nature's signal more liquid is needed. But in winter the semaphore may not function and the body necessarily absorbs what it needs from the intestinal tract, with resultant increase of constipation.

Wherever you are, whatever your income, you must make sure your diet contains vital vitamins. Some of these, automatically present in well-balanced summer rations, may be replaced in winter by orange, tomato or perhaps sauerkraut juice.

You must eat leafy vegetables—lettuce, spinach, water cress, turnip leaves or cabbage—to secure the invaluable inorganic salts which they contain. But remember you are defeating your purpose unless you cook these vegetables for the minimum length of time required to have them done, and use the minimum amount of water. If you fill your kettle too full so that the excess must be poured off, there go your minerals down the drain.

The most important inorganic salt is calcium, an intimate part of the whole defensive mechanism of the body, and the one most likely to be lacking in sufficient quantity. If you want to get on the alkaline side, be sure you are well equipped with this essential buffer food. Milk, our chief source of calcium, should never be omitted from the diet of child or adult.

But calcium, to fulfil its high destiny, must invite for collaborator Vitamin D, which comes coasting down the actinic rays from the sun. For a number of meteorological reasons, the potency of these rays may vary greatly in different sections. Wherever there is a dearth of sun, such as in the great Middle West where it practically goes into retirement from November to April, some substitute is especially necessary. This may consist of drinking irradiated milk, eating irradiated bread, exposing the body to an ultraviolet-ray lamp, devouring the extraordinarily distasteful oil of the cod or the halibut or trade preparations which sometimes combine it in pleasanter and more concentrated doses.

Get Exercised

Body building cannot go forward satisfactorily until the toxins are removed; to achieve this most people now admit exercise is desirable for others, if not for themselves. If the Presidents of the United States have not been above exercising, why should you be? You might not have been able to keep pace with the strenuous T. R. on a point-to-point walk, but you surely could have gone riding in anutomobile with Woodrow Wilson to a golf course. Calvin Coolidge had a favorite electric velocipede on which he pedaled furiously toward prosperity, often applying a contrivance which made it harder for him to surmount imaginary hills. Herbert Hoover gathered his friends about him to sport with the ponderous medicine ball—over the arm, under the arm, over the head, between the legs. President Roosevelt's daily swim is essential to the efficient performance of his duties.

Exercise in winter requires greater thought, concentration, and power of will if the easier way, the road to ill health, is to be avoided. Often a man is so precious of his comfort that he will not walk to office or train and he performs grudgingly the necessary chores of shoveling snow off sidewalks or coal into furnaces. He is not amused. Such activities he classifies as work. Then what is he to do?

Anyone can turn on the radio at seven in the morning, and posture before the open window—up, down, left, right, swing, turn, bend, raise; the orchestra plays merrily; the canary birds twitter; the jocular voice of the director intersperses quips with commands. Or, if exercising alone be too austere, almost anyone may join a gymnasium class. For example, the Whitehall Club in NewYork City offers its members a regular session during the hour before lunch. Should one desire even more conviviality, he may reserve a squash or Badminton court, or perhaps a bowling alley.

But do not try to cram into a few moments the amount of exertion to which you would devote an hour in summer. Fatigue has a double effect; the toxins are not disposed of and the heart, always the focus of strain, grows tired. The rule to follow is, as always, safeguard the heart. If, alarmed by your waistline, you make up your mind to get in trim, you must start in gradually. It is so easy to miscalculate physical endurance.

Sporting for Health

"Winter sports" has a merrier sound than the humdrum word "gymnasium." It carries memories of the jingle of bells and bright costumes against the white background. Children of all ages find tremendous zest in the swift scooping up of snow, the hasty rounding pats, and the half-aimed throw. Or in modeling a snowman, with a caricature of a face—coals for eyes, a beet for a nose, a corncob in his mouth, topped off with a hat, rakishly askew.

The exhilaration of skating brings together both sexes and all ages for common enjoyment on ice-flooded tennis courts as well as country ponds. In Quebec, where the intense cold necessitates windows three deep and the snow creaks underfoot, the glide and the pirouette have long been a fine art. It was so in '99 when I was first there, and is so still. Every night the brightly uniformed band blares the latest rhythms and the couples swing over the ice on skates to the graceful waltz. Our own carnivals, of surpassing beauty and enchantment, embellished with imported talent, are now encouraging the youth of America to go and do likewise.

Skiing, an equally joyous sport, is restricted to certain localities, though we in America are fortunately blessed in mountains. After jorneying on snow trains to near-by hills and valleys, the skilled swoop gracefully down the slopes; the less experienced tumble mirthfully into snowbanks.

Popular in both town and country, at Kansas City as well as Lake Placid, are tobogganing and bobsledding. These cannot properly be called exercise when the effete hire motor trucks to haul them to the top. Nor does sleigh riding in the straw-filled wagon boxes on runners, pleasant as it is, call for much exertion, yet down in Maine it is a highly esteemed relaxation, an offspring of New England conscience coupled with comfortable juxtaposition.

None of these snow and ice sports is a health hazard in itself, though it might be as well to have along a plaster for your skin and a bandage for your brow. In all seriousness, I recommend protecting your eyes from the intense light and blinding sun. You are perhaps in no imminent danger of going snow-blind as do Arctic hunters and explorers, but you will appreciate the relief afforded by Crookes glasses. The pale amber lenses remove the glare with the least hindrance to visibility.

Through the Nose

Breathing in cold air does more than give you rosy cheeks. Your respiration is stimulated, you breathe more deeply and consequently the blood is more thoroughly oxygenated, thus meeting the greater demand for warmth. It is, however, more important to breathe through the nose, nature's provision for warming incoming air before it reaches the lungs. Inhaling frigid air directly may harm the lung tissue and pave the way for pneumonia. Sleeping out of doors is healthful if the bed is heaped high enough with blankets to keep in the warmth. Nevertheless, a hardy person needs less air than an ailing one. Because of an intensive campaign of education regarding the virtues of fresh air, most people think it essential to open the windows wide, summer and winter. Actually, opening them a mere crack will, at zero, provide as much ventilation as full length will do at eighty degrees. The interchange of air is so much more rapid if the interior heat and the exterior cold are widely separated in degrees; the slightest draft sets the air moving violently.

You are apt to ascribe a feeling of being stifled in overheated rooms to the presence of the heat itself and feel that you must get a few "breaths of fresh air." The modern explanation is that your discomfort is due to the fact that you are breathing still air. The change to moving air has a profound effect on the system, although scientists do not yet know the reason why.

Generally speaking, little harm is done by getting cold all over, unless the tissues are actually devitalized. It is drafts which are associated with stiff necks and sore throats. If dancing is to come under the head of winter exercise, it carries its own habards. The ballroom grows warm and a suffering male, self-conscious about his wilting collar, opens a window. A chill draft strikes the bare shoulders of his partner.

"Who opened that wipdow? Please close it quickly," she implores. But two minutes later it is surreptitiously opened again by another dark shadow; four minutes afterward

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

What Are They?

On an occasion when a distinguished critic was to deliver a lecture on Keats in a small town, the president of the local literary society was unable to be present to introduce the speaker; and the mayor, who was more popular than learned, was asked to officiate.

The amiable official introduced the lecturer with his accustomed eloquence, and concluded a few happy remarks of a general character with this observation:

"And now, my friends, we shall soon all know what I personally have often wondered: What—are keats?"

Speaking Of Beliefs

"She is a woman who has gone through a great deal for her belief."

"Indeed? What is her belief?"

"She believes she can wear a No. 5 shoe on a No. 7 foot."

Some Crusts Are Like That

"Where is the paper plate I gave you under your pie?" asked the bride.

"Was that plate?" inquired the groom anxiously. "I thought it was the lower crust."

Tyranny!

A man went to his doctor and requested treatment for his ankle.

After a careful examination the doctor inquired:

"How long have you been going about like this?"

"Two weeks."

"Why, man, your ankle is broken. How you managed to get around at all is a mystery. Why didn't you come to me before?"

"Well, doctor, every time I say anything is wrong with me my wife declares I'll have to stop smoking."

WELCOME PARTY

A welcome party was given in honor of Dr. and Mrs. Leon Mazaud, Director of the Maison Franco-Japonaise de Tokio and Dr. and Mrs. Georges A. Patey and Dr. Georges Bonneau of the Maison by the members of the Paris-kai Society at the Daigo Restaurant, Hamacho, Nihonbashi, at 6:30 p.m. Sunday.

Some 30 persons both French and Japanese were present including Mr. Georges Bonmarchand, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Rouas, Mr. and Mrs. K. Yamazaki, Mrs. K. Omori, Mrs. Koya, Mrs. Tatsuko Tatsuke, Mr. Hayao Kasama, Mr. Noel Nouet, Mr. Georges Audoyer, Mr. and Mrs. A. Gueant, Mr. Watanabe, Mr. Mihara, Miss Ito, Mr. S. Muto and several others.

The classic cooking ceremony of the Momoyama period and a Japanese dance were shown to all the guests.

NEW SYMPHONY RECITAL

The 176th periodical recital of the New Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo will be held at the Hibiya Public Hall, at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, February 17. Mr. Joseph Rosenstock will conduct the orchestra. The program will consist of compositions by Karol Rathaus, Richard Strauss, Johannes Brahms, and Alexander Borodin. Mrs. Nobuye Tanaka, vocalist will assist as the soloist at the recital.

ENTERTAIN AT DINNER

The Rumanian Minister and Mrs. Stoicesco entertained at dinner on Friday evening. The guests included the American Ambassador and Mrs. Joseph C. Grew; the British Ambassador and Lady Clive; the French Ambassador and Mrs. Albert Kammerer; the Swiss Minister and Mrs. Walter Thurnheer; the Norwegian Minister and Mrs. Finn Koren; Mr. Sakurai, Privy Councillor; Mr. and Mrs. Yoshizawa; the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs and Mrs. Kensuke Horinouchi; the Grand Master of Ceremonies of the Imperial Household and Viscountess Matsudaira; Marquis and Marchioness Mayeda; the Japanese Minister to Rumania and Mrs. Kurihara; Mrs. Kawai; Mrs. Hagiwara; Mr. and Mrs. K. Kishi; the Chief of Protocol and Mrs. Hidaka; the Italian Naval Attache, Captain Ghe, and Mr. Moriyama.

TO READ PAPER

Dr. W. Donat will read a paper in German on the subject "Praktische Wege zur Volksgemeinschaft in Deutschland" at the meeting of the German Asiatic Society (7 Hirakawa-cho 2-chome, Kojimachi-ku) at 6 p.m. Wednesday, February 17. Dr. Donat has recently returned from Germany to take up his work at the Deutsch Japanisches Kultur Institut. Non-members as well as members who are interested in this subject are cordially invited to attend.

After the lecture, dinner will be served in the dining room. Members and guests who wish to partake of dinner are requested to notify the secretary of the Society by Tuesday, Friday 16.

ENTERTAIN AT LUNCHEON

President Hayes sailed from Honolulu February 5, and will continue westward sailing from usual ports as follows:— Kobe February 20; Shanghai February 24; Hongkong February 28; Manila March 2; Singapore March 10; Penang March 12; Colombo March 16 and Bombay March 20.

SENDAI NOTES

The Sendai Nipca Club held a Valentine party, attended by twenty-three members and friends, on the evening of February 13, in the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Gerhard. Mr. Goro Murata, news editor of the Japan Times, was the guest of honor, and the party was in the nature, also, of a farewell for Mr. Tetsu Sasaki, who is returning to his home in Hawaii at the close of the present school year.

The usual business meeting was dispensed with on this occasion, and the evening was given over to games, arranged by the committee in charge of Miss Beatrice Yoshie, and to dancing. Refreshments were served, and the rooms were appropriately decorated with hearts and other Valentine symbols.

Miss Camilla Fesperman, the eight-year-old daughter of the Rev. and Mrs. Frank L. Fesperman, had to undergo a sudden operation Sunday, February 7, for appendicitis. The operation was entirely successful and she is coming along very nicely.

The Misses Dorothy Carver, Helen Dozier and Alma Graves, who were weekend guests in Sendai, were the guests of honor at a large party last Friday evening at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Paul L. Gerhard. Refreshments and decorations were à la Valentine, and the party indulged in games and talk "till early."

The Misses Alice and Esther McKnight, and Betty Stoudt, and Jim Fesperman, all of the American School, took advantage of Kigen Setsu and the successful school invasion of Kobe to return to their homes for the past weekend.

Dr. and Mrs. C. D. Kriete spent last weekend in Tokyo.

The Misses Alice Bisley and Alma Naefe were the weekend guests of Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Schroer, in Morioka.

TO SPEAK IN YOKOHAMA

Mr. Arthur Garrels, United States Consul General in Tokyo, will make a speech on subject of "Diplomats and Consuls" from his personal knowledge of these men in government service in all parts of world, at the gathering of members of International Women's Club of Yokohama at the Hotel New Grand, Yokohama at 5 p.m., Friday, February 26.

His keen sense of the dramatic, his humor and his extraordinary ability as a reconteur always add a lively interest to his reminiscences of adventures here and there.

MOVES TODAY

Mrs. Burton Crane and her daughter Silvia moved today to the home of Mrs. Crane's sister, Mrs. R. F. Moss, 79 Kogai-cho, Azabu, the telephone number there is Akasaka (48) 3252.

Mr. H. Voight of the Agfa Gomei Kaisha is taking over Mrs. Crane's former home at 5 Enokizaka, Akasaka.

New U.S. Steel Mill Begins Expansion Plan

must traverse. These automatically register the temperature of the steel and prevent its going through the rollers in case the temperature has fallen below the proper point. At one stage in the 90-second career from 9-inch slab to 3-32-inch plate the steel is subjected to jets of water directed under 1000 pounds pressure to remove the scale.

Company officials assert that the mill will give its product a surface hitherto found only on the best quality hot rolled strip steel, together with uniform gauge and freedom from "shear bow" or warping under the final shears. Two hundred forty-four contractors exclusive of United States Steel Corporation subsidiaries participated in the construction of the mill.

In the final operation four pneumatic fingers of the Soderberg rocking shear hold the plate in place while a specially heat-treated curved blade rocks across with only "point" contact, giving a clean cut without bow or arch.

The construction program for the Clairton and Edgar Thomson Works, announced by President Irwin, involves:

(1) Construction at Clairton of hot strip and cold reduction mills of the most modern design, of 600,000 tons yearly capacity, electrically operated throughout, for the production of sheet and tin plate.

(2) Construction of a new slabbing mill at Edgar Thomson of 1,000,000 tons annual capacity, chiefly to supply slabs to feed the new Clairton mills.

(3) The addition of extensive electric power producing facilities at Edgar Thomson and necessary transmission lines from Braddock to Clairton where much of the new power will be consumed.

Contracts for this program will be let in the near future, and the new mills should be in operation, it is expected, by the late spring or early summer of 1938.

Among those present at the dinner were Myron C. Taylor, chairman of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation; Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., chairman of the finance committee; Benjamin F. Fairless, president of the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corporation; G. Cook Kimball, executive vice-president of Carnegie-Illinois; Irving S. Olds, director of United States Steel; George W. Bacon, of the firm of Ford, Bacon & Davis, and Charles G. Dawes of Chicago.

England Resorts To Gardening Art

To Beautify Country In Preparation For Coronation In May

England has often been called a nation of shopkeepers, but the Coronation Planting Committee aims in the coming year to make visitors think of her as a nation of gardeners, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Gardening, it is true, has been described as the national art of the English people, but the committee wants that art to penetrate into every village and town, to bring beauty to flat dwellers, inhabitants of cities, and the often drab and dreary outskirts of towns, as well as to those who live in England's countryside.

Motto Taken From Ruskin

Taking as its motto Ruskin's words "A nation is only worthy of the soil and scenes that it has inherited when, by all its acts and arts, it is making them more lovely for its children," this committee has been formed to give "help, direction and coherence" to schemes for beautifying the country in commemoration of the Coronation.

How widespread is interest in this committee's work was shown at a recent meeting at the Guildhall at London to which representatives of local authorities from all parts of the country were invited.

Aims Told by Lord Lothian

Explaining the aims and origins of the committee, the Marquis of Lothian, president, said that a desire had been expressed in many quarters to celebrate the Coronation by a fresh effort "to stem the growing vandalism of a mechanical age and to increase the natural wonderful beauty of our countryside by schemes for planting trees and flowering shrubs and by making gardens, especially in the surroundings of our cities and towns."

"Planting holds, perhaps, the most important place in our program," Lord Lothian continued, "but we do not intend to limit our efforts to that aspect alone. We wish to foster any proposals that will result in the improvement and preservation of the amenities of our towns, villages and countryside."

From Windows to Avenues

To aid those who are undertaking such schemes the committee has issued a booklet, "For King and Countryside." Its suggestions for celebrating the Coronation by planting and other amenity schemes range from "the dedication of a noble avenue of trees" to the planting of a window box.

The Coronation Planting Committee, together with the societies cooperating in its program, has also issued pamphlets on tree planting; playparks for young children; window-box gardening; the layout of allotment-garden areas; suggestions for improving the appearance of villages and preserving their amenities; roses, shrubs, fruit trees and herbaceous plants.

Whatever sums have been set aside for celebrating the Coronation, local authorities should seriously consider allocating some portion for permanent schemes of this kind, Lord Lothian urged.

Comfort and Peace

What distinguishes the English countryside from foreign countries is not the wood, the plantation, or even the avenue. It is the single tree in the hedge, or the group of trees in the field, Mr. Oliver Stanley, president of the Board of Education, declared at the meeting. They above everything else give the countryside its characteristic of peaceful comfort and comfortable peace.

"I would like to see," he said, "a register of those who would volunteer to plant at least a tree in a hedge, in a field, or by the side of a lane and in doing so, add their tribute to the beauty of Britain."

For Cities Too

But city dwellers appreciate beauty as well as those who live in the country, and the committee urges the formation of civic societies in each town "to promote, particularly among the young, love of the city and a sense of order that will create beauty."

Opportunities for adding to the amenities of cities and towns are numerous, the committee points out. Land around public buildings can be planted with grass and trees, school surroundings can be made attractive and, wherever possible, a garden should be provided. Blocks of flats can be beautified with window boxes, allotments can be transformed into gardens, play parks for young children, with gardens where their mothers may rest, can be provided, and the drabness of many slum clearance schemes mitigated by substituting grass, trees and flowers for concrete.

Village Competitions

To add beauty to country life as well as to the town, the committee proposes to organize a nation-wide competition between villages. In this way the committee hopes to arouse the interest of country people in their own villages.

Gardening tools all over the country are therefore being looked to with quickened interest, and schoolchildren at Ilkley, Yorks, have in fact already done their Coronation planting. They planted clumps of trees along the banks of the River Wharfe recently, as May, the Coronation month, is not a good month for treeplanting. These trees are to form part of a scheme for laying out this part of the riverside which was bought some years ago by the Ilkley Urban District Council.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

Dr. Butler Fights Child Labor Law

Appeals To 19 Governors To Act Against Ratification; Fears Dictatorial Trend

The battle between champions and opponents of the American Federal Child Labor Amendment, which is expected to reach a climax this year as advocates of the amendment seek approval by at least eleven States, the number still required to make the amendment part of the nation's organic law, grew more intense recently with moves by both sides, says the New York Times.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, chairman of the New York State Committee Opposing Ratification of the Proposed Child Labor Amendment, made public a letter sent to the Governors of nineteen States urging negative action.

At the same time Charles C. Burlingham, chairman of the Nonpartisan Committee for Ratification of the Federal Child Labor Amendment, issued a statement assailing the attitude of Dr. Butler and his organization and challenging the stand taken by the special committee of the American Bar Association in opposition to the amendment.

Ratified by Twenty-five States

Both President Roosevelt and former President Hoover have endorsed the amendment. Recently Kentucky ratified it, increasing the number of States which have voted for ratification to twenty-five. Kentucky was the first State to act favorably after President Roosevelt recently appealed to the Governors of nineteen States for support of the amendment.

Dr. Butler's letter to these Governors was designed to counteract the effect of the President's appeal and of the general agitation in favor of ratification.

Writing as "a long-time worker against child labor," Dr. Butler expressed the hope that the Legislatures in question would not vote for ratification. He argued that the proposal should rightly be called the Youth Control Amendment, saying its purpose and effect would be "to put some 42,000,000 of the nation's population, being all those less than eighteen years of age, under the direct control of Congress," thus depriving the home, the school and the church of the protection they have always enjoyed under American tradition and principles and place them "at the mercy of Congress."

He said the effects of the amendment would be as objectionable and offensive as those of the prohibition amendment when Congress began to legislate with the amendment as the basis. He supported the argument of the American Bar Association for adoption by the several States for a uniform Child Labor Act. Dr. Butler warned also that the amendment would be used as an instrument for the development of dictatorial tendencies in government.

Recipients of Butler Appeal

The Governors to whom Dr. Butler addressed his letter were Wilbur L. Cross, Connecticut; Herbert H. Lehman, New York; R. C. McMullen, Delaware; Fred P. Cone, Florida; E. D. River, Georgia; Walter A. Huxman, Kansas; Harry W. Nice, Maryland; C. F. Hurley, Massachusetts; Lloyd C. Stark, Missouri; R. L. Cochran, Nebraska; Richard Kirman, Nevada; Clyde Tingley, New Mexico; Clyde R. Hoey, North Carolina; Robert E. Quinn, Rhode Island; Olin D. Johnson, South Carolina; Leslie Jensen, South Dakota; Gordon Browning, Tennessee; James V. Allred, Texas; George D. Aiken, Vermont.

Mr. Burlingham accused Dr. Butler's committee and the committee of the American Bar Association of seeking "to divert public attention from the amendment and confuse the issue by offering an ill-considered and unworkable substitute."

"Their proposal for legislation by Congress 'to prohibit the shipment of the products of child labor into and the sale within any State which forbids such sale' rests on the unrealistic assumption that child-made goods can be labeled like those made in prisons," Mr. Burlingham said. "There is a vast difference between enforcing a labeling requirement for goods made in a prison and those manufactured in thousands of individual shops. To insure correct labeling of these would require inspection at all points of production.

"Sixteen years was the standard set by the industrial (NRA) codes, in successful operation for two years and welcomed by industry as well as by labor. With millions of adults still unemployed it is preposterous to allow 14 and 15-year-old children to engage in manufacturing industry."

Seamen Unions Send Threat

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 12—With Pacific Coast shipping once more getting back on its feet after a complete tie-up of more than 100 days, a new threat to a long-term settlement of the maritime dispute was presented today when three seamen unions jointly telegraphed President Roosevelt that "Pacific marine business will again be paralyzed unless the enforcement of the Copeland Act is delayed."

The Copeland Act, it is recalled, provides that seamen must carry books showing their career which naturally enables employers to blacklist those seamen connected with the unions. The seamen were not recognized by shipowners in the terms of the recently-concluded maritime peace pact.

New US Submarine

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

MARE ISLAND, Cal., Feb. 11.—Officials of the Mare Island navy yard announced today that the submarine Pompano was launched this afternoon. They revealed that she is one of the six submarines under construction to replace obsolete undersea craft. The new submarine will carry a complement of five officers and 49 men.

It was simultaneously revealed that three other undersea crafts are nearing completion at the shipyards of the Electric Boat Corporation at Groton, Connecticut.

Grant Wins Final, Defeating Budge

N. Y. Times

TAMPA, Fla., Jan. 17—Bryan M. (Bitsy) Grant, the Atlanta giant-killer, won his second successive tennis final from Donald Budge, the nation's No. 1 ranking amateur, by defeating the Oakland, Calif., ace, 4—6, 6—3, 6—3, 2—6, 6—2, in the Dixie tournament today.

Grant, ranked third nationally, downed the Californian in the final of the Miami Biltmore tournament at Coral Gables last Sunday.

After triumphing in the singles, Bitsy paired with Wayne Sabin, Los Angeles, to win the doubles title. They defeated Frankie Parker of Milwaukee and Lawrenceville, N. J., and Walter Senior of San Francisco, 6—8, 6—4, 6—3.

With both players in perfect condition and apparently at the peak of their games, the Atlantan outplaced and outlasted Budge. Their terrific placements and passing shots were perfectly timed.

The Atlantan failed to get many of Budge's smashing shots in the opening set, but in the second he made retrieves which seemed almost impossible. He would work Budge out of position, then drop a soft shot just over the net or place the ball on the inside of the baseline in the corner.

Budge won the seventh game, but Grant breezed through the next two games to take the set at 6-3.

Budge led at 2-0 in the third set before Grant won three games in a row. Budge took the sixth game. Grant won the next two, losing only one point in each. They deuced the ninth game six times before Grant took the game and set.

The victory was the second for Grant over players ranked higher nationally in the last two days. He beat Parker, No. 2 ranking player, in the semi-finals yesterday.

All-Woman Jury Finds Man Guilty

Train Robber Who Acted As His Own Lawyer And Excluded Men Faces 30-Year Term

N. Y. Times

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 18—A railway robber turned lawyer failed in defense of himself here today when an all-woman jury, the first to sit in Federal court, turned its collective thumb down on his tearful appeal for freedom.

The amateur attorney was Peter Guarino, 38-year-old convict and ex-roadhouse operator, who was found guilty of being a principal in the $958 robbery of an Erie train in the Walnut Street Station, Nutley, on Good Friday, April 17.

Guarino, who is dark, forceful and able to talk dramatically when he wants to, was himself responsible for the absence of men in the jury box. Last Friday he challenged four prospects of his own sex, and contrived to have women selected even as the two alternates, who did not get anything to do.

Mother and Wife Sob

The defendant had put on a fiery show in his own behalf, letting his voice sink at times, then gathering momentum and bursting out in unexpected eloquence. His mother and wife were there, and they sobbed as he started, but attendants calmed them.

Guarino's lack of experience at the bar drew a reminder from Judge Guy L. Fake to the effect that since he had not put himself upon the stand he had to base his argument on facts brought out in the testimony. The defendant, who had begun to narrate how on the day of the hold-up he had visited a pawnshop in downtown Newark, thus suffered a slight setback in his style but continued undiscouraged.

He had gone voluntarily to Newark headquarters when he heard he was wanted, he declared. He attacked the identification of himself by four government witnesses and referred to the statement of Dr. Rocco J. Caruso, who had attended Guarino's dying father on April 17.

"I am accused of committing a robbery as my father lay dying," he went on, looking intently at the dozen jurors, whom he repeatedly addressed as "Ladies of the jury."

"Would I not have wanted to be at his funeral? Would I take a chance of not being able to be there?"

He pointed next to the testimony of his mother, Mrs. Rose Guarino, who had apparently suffered considerably over her son's derelictions in the past.

"My mother," he said, pointing to her, "—my mother never in any court testified for me before. If she thought I was guilty she would never on God's earth have taken the stand."

He was sure he would have no chance with a "narrow-minded" jury, he said.

"But I have a real broad-minded jury," he went on. "All I ask for is justice. I am innocent as God is my judge."

"Now in the Balance"

Guarino let his voice fall again, and announced that "I am now in the balance."

"If you ladies open your hands," he went on, "I am lost. If you close your hands, I may be saved. Ladies, my whole fate is in your hands."

It was the final moment. Guarino's head drooped and tears welled to his eyes. He rushed to the counsel table, buried his head in his hands and wept. His shoulders heaved as he sobbed, and the members of his family began to cry all over again.

Hyman Halpern, the counsel assigned, who had coached Guarino, was not allowed to add to the summing up. For the prosecution Hubert J. Harrington, Assistant District Attorney, warned the jury not to be swayed by sympathy.

"That is the entire basis of the case," he added.

William B. Reilly, deputy court clerk, waited to ask the decisive question when the jurors returned at 4:15, half an hour after they had filed out.

"Have you reached a verdict?" he demanded, tonelessly.

"We have," replied Mrs. Nettie A. Tallman of Union Township, the foreman.

"What is that verdict?" pursued the clerk.

"We find the defendant guilty as charged," said Mrs. Tallman crisply.

Mr. Halpern demanded a poll, and each juror, promptly and not the least bit fussed, said "guilty."

Guarino stared, tightened his lips and allowed his features to form a half grin, half sneer. Already under a twelve-year sentence to State's prison for a hold-up in Carlstadt last January, he is now liable to a maximum punishment of thirty years in prison and $15,000 fine. He will be sentenced tomorrow.

Italy's Shipping Reformed to Ban Old Competition

1,000,000,000 Lire To Be Spent During Next Six Years For Ship Building

Effecting the control of the Fascist State over Italian shipping, the Italian Government has approved a plan for reorganizing the Italian Merchant Marine. It is a program of concentration, organization and finance. The object of the scheme is to eliminate overlapping and competition, says the Rome correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

The existing nine shipping combines, into which the innumerable shipping companies were merged in several stages during the past 10 years and which today have about 200 ships, representing a total tonnage exceeding 1,200,000, have now been further concentrated into four big companies. The former shipping firms cease to operate and their services were taken over as of Jan. 1, 1937, by the four new lines. The latter are purchasing from the existing concerns their ships and other assets at prices already agreed upon.

Four Main Groups

The four main groups of Italian shipping lines will in future be the Italia, Lloyd Triestino, Tirrenia and Adriatica.

The Italia, with headquarters at Genoa and a share capital of 500,000,000 lire, will run passenger and cargo services between Italy and North, Central and South America. This company will have 38 vessels of 468,44 tons. It will be a merger of the existing Italian and Cosulich lines.

The Lloyd Triestino, with headquarters at Trieste and a share capital of 300,000,000 lire, will operate the lines between Italy and Africa beyond the Suez Canal and Gibraltar, Asia beyond Suez, and Australia. It owns 59 ships of 443,383 gross tonnage. Its routes formerly were operated by the Lloyd Triestino, Tirrenia, Societa Veneziana di Navigazione and Navigazione Libera Triestina companies.

North European Ports

The Tirrenia, with headquarters at Naples and a share capital of 50,000,000 lire, will run services to Libya, around Italy, the western Mediterranean, and via Gibraltar, to northern Europe. It will have 54 ships with a total of 158,956 tons. Previously several companies operated steamers on these routes including the Lloyd Triestino, Adria, the Tirrenia Adriatica and the Societa Sardadi Navigazione.

The Adriatica, with headquarters at Venice and a share capital of 150,000,000 lire, will serve the Adriatic and the eastern Mediterranean with a fleet of 39 ships having a tonnage of 136,261.

Control of these companies is vested for the next six years in the Institute for Industrial Reconstruction, a state institution, which is to have a majority of the share capital for such period.

The institute will occupy itself with the technical coordination of the four shipping companies, and will extend to them the necessary financial assistance. Private investors will be given an opportunity to subscribe part of the share capital, and to be represented on the boards of directors of the companies.

The Industrial Reconstruction Institute will exercise control through a holding company, called the Maritime Financial Company (short style Finmare) with a share capital of a maximum of 900,000,000 lire. The company will be managed by the institute, which will issue in respect of share capital a special series of 20-year bonds, carrying 4½ per cent interest per annum, plus a variable dividend equal to three quarters of the difference between 4½ per cent interest and the actual dividends collected by Finmare.

The principal of the bond and the 4½ per cent interest are both guaranteed by the Italian Treasury. Bondholders will have the option of converting their bonds at any time into shares of Finmare. The Industrial Reconstruction Institute is to create a Finmare special fund of 100,000,000 lire to serve as an equalization fund for the dividends of Finmare.

Navigating staffs are to be taken over by the new companies with no alternation in present status. The shore staffs of the old companies are to be liquidated, the new companies taking on the personnel in a measure and functions according to their requirements, and on new terms. The new personnel must be chosen from the liquidated staffs of the old companies.

New Ship Program

Through Finmare, the Industrial Reconstruction Institute is also to assure the financing of a fresh building program by the new companies which will aggregate 1,000,000,000 lire spread over the next six years.

So far as the Treasury is concerned, the financial burden remains unchanged and the subsidies paid by the state to the shipping companies will remain at the present figures.

On the North and South American run, some of the liners will have new machinery installed in order to give them greater speed. Fast Italian liners on the India service will call at Massawa and other Italian East African ports. It is announced that 254 calls a year will be made at East African ports to stimulate trade with Italy's new empire.

This reorganization of the Italian merchant marine amounts to its nationalization. In March last, Premier Mussolini announced that the state would assume control, and in some cases ownership, of key industries. The step now taken is in pursuance of the policy outlined by the Duce at that time.

Harvard Quintet Defeats Cornell

N. Y. Times

ITHACA, N. Y., Jan. 16—An injury-ridden Cornell basketball team lost its fourth straight Eastern Intercollegiate League game tonight, bowing to Harvard, 40 to 26.

George Lowman and Ernest Gray led the visitors. The former scored 12 points while Gray, rangy center, tallied five baskets. The Cornellians were paced by Walt Foertsch with 9 points.

The Crimson gained a big lead early in the first half and was never headed thereafter as the Ithacans played raggedly without the services of their captain, Tom Rich.

McGowan Gets First Goal

McGowan counted from under the basket shortly after the opening whistle. The Red forged ahead on baskets by Liebman and Foertsch but Lowman and White pushed the Crimson into a 13-to-4 lead midway through the period.

Finding the range again, the home team tallied 7 points on goals by McDonald, Doering and Foertsch and a foul conversion by Foertsch. Baskets by Bowman, Gray and White and success on free tries widened the visitors' margin. Doering shot a basket for Cornell as the half ended with Harvard ahead, 20 to 13.

Cornell Calls Time

Completely dominating the play, Harvard ran its lead to 29 to 16 when the harassed Cornellians called time. Lavine dropped in a double-decker and Liebman a free try for the Ithacans. Gray tallied twice while McDonald and Foertsch sank shots for the Red. Harvard led, 37 to 20, when with only five minutes left Cornell added 6 points against the Crimson's reserves near the close.

Ronald Colman Brings Masterpiece To Life

becomes a thing of beauty to be remembered forever by film fans.

For spectacular values, it is doubtful whether any picture since the advent of sound can be compared with "A Tale of Two Cities." Swinging the focal point of interest between London and Paris, it depicts the slow fomenting of revolt among the masses of the French peasantry, shows the intimate events that touch the flame to the powder, and then crowds the screen with such stirring scenes of tumult that words are empty to describe them.

Of the distinguished cast—there are 112 speaking parts in the picture, more than half created by famous players—it is difficult to select outstanding performances, for every characterization is a gem. Elizabeth Allan, who first attracted attention in "David Copperfield," gives a magnificent performance as Lucie, and Donald Woods is the perfect Charles Darnay.

Edna May Oliver as the fiery Miss Pross rises to totally unexpected dramatic heights and becomes a new personality, a powerful emotional actress. Blanche Yurka, the distinguished stage star, making her screen debut as Mme. DeFarge, leader of the wild forces of revolution, is a sensational hit. Reginald Owen is everything Mr. Stryver might be expected to be, and Basil Rathbone contributes an excellent performance as the cruel Marquis St. Evremonde.

Henry B. Walthall as the tragic Dr. Manette is a character that will go down in screen history as one of the finest accomplishments of the films. Walter Catlett, known all his professional life as a comedian, does a complete about-face and becomes the villainous Barsad, and a consummate hit. Fritz Leiber, the famous Shakespearean star, makes his first appearance on the screen as Gaspard, and will be seen again and frequently for his work is outstanding.

Mitchell Lewis as Ernest DeFarge; Claude Gillingwater as Jarvis Lorry; Billy Bevan as Jerry Cruncher; Lucille Laverne as La Vengeance; Tully Marshall as the Woodcutter—these are roles that deserve especial mention for their intelligent portrayal, and other players including Elly Malyon, E. E. Clive, Lawrence Grant, John Davidson, Tom Ricketts, Donald Haines, Fay Chaldecott and many, many more add to their laurels with outstanding work.

Isabel Jewell as the little seamstress rises to stellar heights. Her role is brief, but it is one that always will be remembered for it gives Miss Jewell such a dramatic opportunity as has been accorded few actresses.

"A Tale of Two Cities" was produced for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer by David O. Selznick, the man who gave the screen "David Copperfield," and to him and his director, Jack Conway, too much praise cannot be given.

Italy Proposes More Power In 2 Motorships

Roma And Augustus Are Ordered Re-engined For Weekly Service To U.S.

The Italian motorships Roma and Augustus, the latter the largest vessel of her type in the world, are to be re-engined and reconditioned to increase their speed to twenty-seven knots so that, along with the big express liners Rex and Conte di Savoia, the Italian line can maintain a weekly service between Italy and New York, it was reported recently in the New York Herald Tribune. The plan is part of the Italian government's reorganization of the Italian merchant marine, which, on January 1, merged nine companies with four new shipping lines under government control.

The Roma, a vessel of 32,583 gross tons and built in 1926, had been employed in trans-Atlantic service to New York until several months ago, when she was withdrawn. She is scheduled, according to the Italian Line's latest sailing list, to leave Genoa for New York via Nice, Naples and Gibraltar.

Now on South America Run

The Augustus, which for several years also was in the trans-Atlantic service to New York, has been operating recently between Italy and the east coast of South America. The Augustus, of 30,418 gross tons, was built in 1927.

What type of propulsion machinery will be fitted into the Roma and Augustus has not been decided, according to the reports. Some experts favor steam turbines, others the installation of oil engines similar to those recently fitted into the company's motor liner Vulcania, which also is employed in the New York service. Diesel-electric drive also has been proposed.

The four new companies formed under the reorganization include the Italia (Italian Line), Lloyd Triestino, Tirena and Adriatica. For the next six years the control of these companies will be held by the Industrial Reconstruction Institute, a state organization, with the controlling interests being exercised by a holding company, the Societa Finanziaria Marittima (Finmare).

Fleet of Thirty-eight Ships

The Italia group, under the plans, will control all Italian trans-Atlantic shipping, including that to the North and South Americas, with a fleet of thirty-eight vessels; the Lloyd Triestino will operate fifty-nine ships in trade to Africa, Asia and Australia; the Tirena, fifty-four to the Tyrnenian Sea and North Africa, and the Adriatica, with thirty-nine ships, will maintain service to Adriatic and eastern Mediterranean ports.

Aroldo Palanca, former general manager of the company in New York, has been appointed general manager of the new Italia set-up in Genoa. Mr. Palanca, accompanied by his successor in New York, Italo E. Verrando, will arrive in New York from Italy on the Conte di Savoia. He will remain here several weeks before sailing for Genoa to assume his new post.

The Italian Cabinet, in approving the reorganization of the country's trade fleets, authorized the expenditure of about $50,000,000 for the construction of new vessels and the re-engining of others.

$50,000,000 Construction Program

Other plans called for under the reorganization follow:

The construction of a new improved vessel of the Victoria type for service to the Far East. The new ship, to be about 25,000 gross tons, will have a speed of from twenty-two to twenty-three knots. The Victoria, originally built for express service from Italy to Alexandra, will return to that run.

Keels for eleven motorships of 5,000 gross tons each, for entrance in the Italy-North Europe run, will be laid during the year at shipyards in Fiume, Palermo and Genoa and will be ready for delivery in 1939.

The cargo service from Italy to London and Hamburg will be extended. One line will be formed to service Belgium, Great Britain and Germany and another for Holland Norway and Denmark.

New construction is contemplated for the Italian services to the Levant and Black Sea and for the cargo services to the East Indies.

Lloyd Triestino will modernize some of its vessels now operating between Italy and Africa.

The Cosulich company which has operated a trans-Atlantic line for the last thirty-three years and has been in existence for the last eighty years, ceases to exist as an independent company under the reorganization plan. The lines and ships operated by the Cosulich are transferred to the new Italia group.

The Cosulich firm also founded the Montfalcone shipyard at Trieste, where many of Italy's passenger and freight ships were built and which now is operated by about 8,000 men.

Dots On Pacific Soon Will Pave Way to Antipodes

Treeless Isles For 80 Years To Be Stepping Stone On Air Service

Literary Digest

Before Pan American Airways flung an all-American air-mail route across the Pacific from Honolulu to Manila, Howland, Baker and Jarvis Islands were pin-point red dots on an all-British map of the greatest ocean. Today, possession is nine points of the law.

Map-scanners looked at these three bits of sand and coral near the equator. For eighty years they had been treeless, grassless bits of soil, a dozen feet above the lapping Pacific, charted only in musty files at Washington and London.

What caused aviation editors to thumb through forgotten envelops in newspaper morgues was an Associated Press dispatch, picked up from the San Diego Union, saying that a new twenty-ton Pan American Airways clipper-ship had left Miami for San Francisco. This giant plane, it was reported, would survey a new sky-trail to the antipodes from Honolulu to Australia-New Zealand.

Dan Sayre, Pan American's genial, robust contact man with the press, soon put inquiring reporters right—the Union's story was a "stumer." The great flying-boat would not operate out of Honolulu for the next five months. Had they thought twice, aviation editors would have realized that flying-boats on the Honolulu-Melbourne route would be as out of place as sail-makers on an ocean greyhound.

Island Boss

Next year, however, there may be an air-mail line to the antipodes. Getting ready for it is one of the Government's oddest jobs. R. B. Black, of the Department of the Interior, is boss of Uncle Sam's three new desert islands.

Way-stations on the air-line to Suva, Fiji (British), Auckland, New Zealand and Melbourne, Australia, they are as coveted today as if their coral were gold. They lie in a strategic position along this sky-trail.

Few persons ever had heard of them until the Coast Guard cutter Itasca slipped down there last summer from Honolulu. On each were landed four boys from the Kamehameha School to take and keep possession for the United States. Their first job was to set up leaden plates warning "trespassers" that this was American soil.

As colonial administrator, Mr. Black has twelve citizens under his jurisdiction, four on each islet. America's newest frontier—the air frontier—is governed from Honolulu, though these islets are not yet part of the Territory of Hawaii. Only means of communication is by the Itasca.

Heavy Seas

The cutter, on her first trip, took along building materials, seedlings and cuttings for ironwood, cashew, mango, breadfruit, Hawaiian oranges, passion-fruit and sea-grapes. On her second voyage, there were tractors and plows to turn bumpy natural landing-fields into smooth tarmac runways.

Recently, another Coast Guard cutter, the Duane, is en route for Howland Island with Mr. Black, Robert Campbell, Divisional Airport Inspector for the Department of Commerce; a naval air pilot, six Army enlisted men and several WPA workers. Two tractors and a cement-mixer will be landed for constructing two airplane runways.

Land-planes rather than flying-boats will be used on the 5,000-mile service to the antipodes. Already, these landing-areas could be used for emergencies, but water surrounding the islands is too rough for seaplanes to make a safe landing and tie up for refueling and inspection. These landing-fields are a mile long, face directly into the prevailing winds and are sufficiently wide for their purpose.

Angry seas beat directly on the shore, surf booms and piles up in wintry weather until landing even by skiff is dangerous. It is a lonely life the twelve native-boy colonists lead, but a life that any live American boy would jump at. They are bound there for six months until others replace them, but they all want to stay if they can.

Old-timers

Flotsam and jetsam on the beach where they landed tell of shipwrecks and survivors who stayed years until they were taken off. Back in the 'fifties and 'sixties these three were guano islands where laborers shoveled into sacks deposits left for centuries by mewing seabirds, sent them to fertilize rocky soil of far-off New England. Weathered boards still mark graves of sailormen buried by skippers of Yankee clippers of another era.

On Howland Island there is a trench several hundred feet long and a hundred-odd feet wide, ten to fifteen feet deep, landmark of bygone Polynesian colonists who dug down for water to grow their favorite taro crop.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Romance In Vienna Stars William Powell

Philanderings of a debonair artist in Vienna, complications over past love affairs and a scrape over the portrait of a married woman that gets into print are among the details that provide a story of whimsical humor and gripping drama, lilting music and Continental romance, in "Escapade," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's engaging new production playing at the Imperial Theater from Thursday.

William Powell provides a clever performance as the chief figure in the cocktail of mirth and romance, which serves to introduce a striking new personality in Luise Rainer, brunette stage star from Vienna who makes her screen debut as his leading lady. Robert Z. Leonard's direction is unusually skillful, and spectacular musical interludes introduce compositions by Walter Jurmann and Bronislaw Kaper, European composers of Jan Kiepura's hits.

Falls in Love with Model

Blending every possible element in entertainment through its dramatic twists, the play deals with a popular artist in Vienna, who through a flirtation paints a married woman's picture which accidentally gets into print. Hunting a model to serve as an alibi he finds the demure companion of a countess. When he falls in love with her, a jealous sweetheart, his previous escapades, and other troubles provide a complication that runs from whimsical comedy to a vivid dramatic climax.

Powell plays a Continental Lothario with deft skill and engaging personality. Miss Rainer rises to dramatic heights, and shows her versatility by whimsical humor and romantic highlights as well. Frank Morgan, as the suspicious doctor husband, provides a well-balanced performance with much subtle funmaking, and Virginia Bruce is beautiful and interesting as the philandering wife.

Mady Christians provides drama as the jealous sweetheart who shoots the artist. Reginald Owen is inimitable as the absent-minded musician, and Laura Hope Crews plays the crusty, scandal-loving old countess with deft skill. Henry Travers provides comedy as the gardener, and Mathilde Comont and others are in an elaborate cast.

While not a musical, the picture has several big musical interludes. The great opera scene in which the voice of Enrico Caruso lives again in specially amplified recordings, the music hall where Lorraine Bridges sings the new song hit, "You're All I Need," and the grand ball provide brilliant episodes in the lilting new picture.

Dog Has Stand-In

A "property dog" was manufactured on the Columbia lot to resemble "Penny Fizz", Rita La Roy's prize Brussels Griffon, Belgian dog she carried in her scenes. The "toy" was used for the real canine's "stand-in."

Britons Bar Drink As Divorce Cause

Bill's Section Making Incurable Drunkenness Grounds Is Deleted In Commons

An amendment to the Marriage Bill, deleting a section that would make incurable drunkenness grounds for divorce, was carried in the standing committee of the House of Commons recently after the measure as a whole had been attacked from all sides, says the New York Times.

Sir Patrick Hannon, Conservative, said that he regarded "every move to open the doors to divorce in this country as an attack upon the structure of society and a blow to the unity and sanctity of the home."

The Rev. R. W. Sorensen, Laborite, opposed the amendment and objected to members speaking for a "religious section of the community." He said he was opposed to all kinds of divorce, but also was opposed to the House's accepting "any particular theological interpretations" of the right and wrong of the Marriage Law.

Conditions in U.S. Are Cited

W. P. Spens, Conservative, referred to the difficulty of deciding what degree of drunkenness was necessary as grounds for divorce.

"I feel the country would be dangerously near to what obtains in the United States, that certain judges would be known as easy divorcers, other judges as difficult," he said.

A. M. Lyons, Conservative, supporting the amendment, said that the original clause would mean "entry upon the slippery slope, easy for divorce, but leading to misery, trouble and anxiety worse than the promoters of the bill seek to redress."

The bill, which has received second reading, provides that a petition for divorce may be presented either by husband or wife on the ground that the respondent:

(1) Has committed adultery; (2) has deserted the petitioner for a period of at least three years; (3) has treated the petitioner with cruelty; (4) is incurably insane and has been continuously a certified lunatic for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition; (5) is an incurable habitual drunkard and has for at least three years been separated from the petitioner in consequence of habitual drunkenness, or (6) is undergoing imprisonment on a commuted death sentence.

Decision on Communion

LONDON, Jan. 21—Bishops of the Convocation of Canterbury, meeting in Westminster Abbey, decided today that divorced persons who remarry may continue to take communion. The convocation rejected a resolution, advanced by the Bishop of Ely, which would have denied communion to such persons.

"I cannot condemn these people to spiritual death," declared the Bishop of London, referring to communicants of the Anglican Church who remarry after divorce. Only the Bishop of St. Albans supported the resolution, which read:

"This house is not able to approve the admission to holy communion of persons who, having remarried after divorce and having thereby transgressed the law of Christ and the church, continue to live in disregard of moral obligations which must bind those who are to be admitted to holy communion."

The Bishop of Ely said the church held that a divorced person who remarried sinned against the seventh commandment.

An adopted resolution on the divorce question provided that holy communion could be given even to "guilty" as well as "innocent" persons married more than once.

The lower house of the convocation approved a resolution urging stronger safeguards against collusion in obtaining divorces, terming such collusion not "uncommon."

The Dean of Winchester, who presented the resolution, declared that the "scandal of collusion is familiar to all." He mentioned no specific cases, but said that "the people in the sort of divorce suits now taking place are prepared to go to the length of 'put-up' adultery."

The dean asserted that measures on divorce now before Parliament did not deal with these people.

Simultaneously, the Convocation of York, at York, discussed the coronation of King George VI, which the Archbishop of York described as a dedication of King and consort to the service of the King of Kings.

Democrats Plan $10,500,000 Drive

National Committee Favors Idea Of W. F. Morgan; State Yields Would Be Split Up

A new plan for party financing, aimed to produce more than $10,000,000 for Democratic campaigns of the next four years and at the same time to keep away "chiselers," was tentatively approved by the Democratic National Committee in a meeting at Washington recently, according to the New York Times.

The plan, as presented by W. Forbes Morgan, Democratic National Treasurer, involves a reorganization of the fund-raising machinery. Collections would be made under the direction of paid managers, and the control, both of the contribution solicitations and of disbursements, would rest with a central organization in Washington.

Mr. Morgan supported by Chairman Farley, urged that the plan be put in operation as soon as possible with the idea of raising $1,000,000 for committee activities for 1937; $2,000,000 in 1938, when a Congressional campaign will take place; $2,500,000 for 1939 and $5,000,000 in the Presidential year of 1940.

The committee's approval of the general outline of the plan was unanimous. Mr. Farley was authorized to name a subcommittee to work out its details and report it back for final adoption. Simultaneously, the committee authorized an appropriation of $500,000 to Mr. Farley to carry on and solidify the present campaign organization.

Patronage Idea Is Raised

But although there was no real opposition to the fund-raising plan, Edwin N. Shields, Committeeman from Michigan, questioned it from the floor.

"When the people contribute," said Mr Shields, "they want recognition from the powers they think exist politically. In Michigan we give joint receipts to contributors from the National Committeeman and the State chairman. You would be surprised to know how happy they were to get those receipts and carry them and show them whenever they wanted something."

Chairman Farley seemed amused at this remark.

"You evidently are discussing the patronage situation," Mr. Farley said.

"Why, certainly," exclaimed Mr. Shields with an air of surprise. "That's what we're here for, isn't it?"

"Well, I must say you are pretty frank," Mr. Farley replied with a laugh.

Under the Morgan plan, full-time State directors would be compensated by salaries and commissions in the raising of the funds. Each State would have one campaign fund for all political purposes and money would be apportioned among national, State, county and city treasuries.

Costlier Campaigns Predicted

Mr. Morgan told the committee that a more workable and more efficient means of financing party activities in the future was necessary. He warned the members that Presidential campaigns evidently would become increasingly expensive, creating the necessity for efficient use of funds and effective means of collection.

Senator McAdoo, committeeman for California, urged adoption of the plan, saying that the situation in California made some such arrangement necessary. The party was bothered so much with "chiselers" in California, he said, that much of the money collected for campaign purposes never reached the national committee.

Mr. Morgan said that his plan would operate from the top down, each State director appointing county directors whose duty it would be to obtain the cooperation of all groups.

"The chairman and the treasurer," he continued, "should delegate real powers to the State directors. It would not be permitted for any group to solicit money except through the finance directors and all money would go to the State funds for division.

"We have got to educate political leaders, especially in the doubtful States, so that collections in any State, even doubtful States, will be shared by the National Committee."

The plan would be submitted, Mr. Morgan said, to Democratic members of Congress and Governors, and would be worked out to avoid interfering with various financing plans now in force in several States.

Mr. Morgan also presented a statement of the party's present finances, which showed a net deficit of about $450,000. He explained several activities through which officials expected to reduce this amount, including the sale of the de luxe Democratic Convention Book and the series of Victory Dinners to be held throughout the country on the evening of March 4. He thought, he said, that the book sales would net close to $225,000, and pointed out that the Jackson Day Dinners in 1936 had produced a profit of some $345,000.

If both these efforts turn out as hoped, the deficit will be wiped out and the committee will have money left over to apply on the 1937 budget, which Mr. Morgan placed for the present at $500,000.

US Navy Designs Unique Gun Turret

Cooling System Allows Placing Of 14-Inch Guns In Each Battery Of New Battleships

The two 35,000-ton battleships to be built by the United States navy will have a speed of 26 to 27 knots and carry three turrets containing nine 16-inch guns or twelve 14-inch guns, says the New York Times.

These and other details were disclosed at a press conference recently by Secretary Claude A. Swanson, although much information was withheld for reasons of naval secrecy.

That each turret can now hold four instead of a maximum of three big guns was regarded as an indication that the navy had developed refinements in refrigeration and air conditioning that would offset the the great heat generated in the operation of batteries of four, but officials maintained a close silence concerning this development, which appeared to be exclusive for the United States.

In announcing that the battleships would have a speed of only 26 or 27 knots instead of the speed of 30 or more knots indicated for battleships being built by some other powers, Secretary Swanson defended the decision on both technical and policy grounds.

To furnish a speed of 30 knots, he said, would require a surrender of too much armor. The American Navy, he declared, is going to build battleships, not armored cruisers, so has decided on ships strong in guns and armor.

Emphasis on Armor

The law authorizing the construction, he pointed out, is for the replacement of battleships, not the building of new cruisers, and the navy is going to comply with that law. Moreover, he said, the navy does not think two or three knots in a battleship make as much difference as armor and guns.

He pointed out that the new ships would be five or more knots speedier than the present United States battleships, which were designed for 21 knots but which now make, on the average, only 19 or 20 knots.

He declined to give details concerning the armor protection other than to admit that it would be ample for defense against aerial bombs. That the design will incorporate the latest and best advances in naval construction since the last battleship was laid down by the navy, in 1920, is apparent. The plans for the new ships have been virtually completed, though some details remain for adjustment.

It is regarded as almost assured that the battleships will carry sixteen-inch instead of fourteen-inch guns, because there is little expectation that Japan will adhere to the London naval treaty. If she has not done so by April 1, sixteen-inch guns will be permitted. Should she adhere by April 1, then fourteen-inch guns would be required as a maximum caliber under the term of the treaty.

Decisive Battle Is Aim

Whatever the caliber of the big guns, it is evident from the details disclosed by Secretary Swanson, and particularly from the emphasis on guns and armor that the Navy is adhering to its tradition of being prepared to fight to a decision in battle, and not to use its ships primarily for maneuvering at a distance.

In confirming this traditional policy naval officers considered all factors involved in the continental position of the United States and lessons of the World War. They gave particular attention to the battle of Jutland, in effect refighting it many times in order to determine the many elements to be assessed in deciding the characteristics of the new battleships.

The new battleships will cost about $50,000,000 each, and require about four years for construction. The keels will be laid down about June 1. Secretary Swanson explained that the plans would be completed about March 15, permit awarding of contracts in thirty to sixty days more.

One ship will be built in a government yard, and bids will be invited from private yards for the other. Should the private bids be excessive, the navy will be prepared to construct both in government yards. The navy yards already navy contracts, notwithstanding that because of these provisions the navy has been experiencing difficulty in obtaining bids from large producers on steel and copper.

Asked concerning a report that Britain, which has already laid the keels of two battleships, might build a third one, Secretary Swanson replied that he had no knowledge to that effect. In any event, have been asked to prepare estimates.

No Trouble Expected

Mr. Swanson said he did not expect trouble in obtaining bids from private yards. He added that the labor provisions of the Walsh-Healey Act would apply, as in other he said, the United States Navy does not expect to ask Congress for another battleship. The navy, he explained, has its program and hopes Congress will continue it, so that it can be completed in 1942, when it is planned to have the navy at treaty levels in the various categories.

More Money for Drydock

Secretary Swanson said that he would ask Congress to increase its authorization for a floating drydock to be used at Pearl Harbor for battleships and aircraft carriers from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. Recently, when private bids were invited, only one was received, and that was for $21,000,000. It was rejected. After consultation with naval experts, Mr. Swanson decided that the government could build a suitable drydock for $12,000,000. It is expected this dock will be built in a West Coast navy yard.

The Navy Department announced that twelve vessels under construction in navy yards and private shipbuilding plants would be launched in the next twelve months, as follows:

Somers, destroyer, 1,850 tons, building at the Federal Shipbuilding and Drydock Company, Kearny, N. J.; launching date, March 1.

Wainwright, destroyer, 1,850 tons, building at the Federal Shipbuilding and Drydock Company, Kearny, N. J.; May 1.

Patterson, destroyer, 1,500 tons, building at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, Bremerton, Wash.; May.

Jarvis, destroyer, 1,500 tons, building at the Puget Sound Navy Yard; May.

Savannah, cruiser, 10,000 tons, building at the New York Shipbuilding Corporation, Camden, N. J.; June 1.

Benham, destroyer, 1,500 tons, building at the Federal Shipbuilding and Drydock Company, Kearny, Sept. 1.

Nashville, cruiser, 10,000 tons, building at the New York Shipbuilding Corporation, Camden, Oct. 1.

Ellet, destroyer, 1,500 tons, building at the Federal Shipbuilding and Drydock Company, Kearny, Nov. 1.

Phoenix, cruiser, 10,000 tons, building at the New York Shipbuilding Corporation, Camden, Feb. 1, 1938.

Secretary Swanson again said recently that the navy preferred to put its money into warships rather than into lighter-than-air ships and, therefore, was not prepared to recommend to Congress a resumption of navy dirigible activities. The General Board, he added, was still undecided on lighter-than-air policy.

College Training For Police Held Answer to Crime

Vocation Of Policing Can Be Raised To A Profession, Says Superintendent

Policemen should go to college. That is the theory of George T. Ragsdale, superintendent of police training in Louisville, a pioneer in this branch of education, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Not all policemen are ready for college, any more than all colleges are ready to train policemen, but Mr. Ragsdale, after 18 years' work with the Louisville department and close study or observation of many others, believes the vocation of policing can be raised to a profession.

Circularized the Colleges

To that end, Mr. Ragsdale last year sent a circular to 171 colleges in an effort to interest them in police training courses and as a result more than 35 of these institutions are planning such courses. In Berkeley, Calif.; San Jose, Calif.; Wichita, Kan.; Louisville, and a few other places, universities have worked out definite programs and "seem to be making progress in police education and in reducing crime in the communities." However, letters from the offices of college presidents for the most part indicate a lack of knowledge of how to attack the problem, he says.

"In all other great problems," explains Mr. Ragsdale, "society has called upon the educational field to suggest some way of solution. It has been the custom of society to turn over the problem of the criminal to the police. This problem has come to be so great that police have concluded they must meet it by education. Consequently, in perhaps 100 cities in the United States, schools have been established for training police recruits.

"Moreover, because the ways of the criminal change, nearly every police department has what has come to be known as a continuation school, which all members of the force must attend. In addition, there are special schools, such as that for traffic education, established by the International Association of Police Chiefs; the schools of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and regional lecture courses in various localities."

Need New Methods

All this is being done by the police themselves, and usually done well, Mr. Ragsdale points out; but he adds that there is a difference between what can be taught by men trained in an occupation by experience alone and by men trained both in college and by experience. That difference can be met, he believes, by training police instructors in college. Policemen, he adds, need the viewpoint of those who make it their business to gather data and to outline methods of education for all. They need new ways of thinking and new methods of approach.

Not all the 175,000 peace officers in the United States could be trained, Mr. Ragsdale admits, but surveys show that 55,000 of them are under 35 years of age, with high intelligence quotients, and good records. Probably 45,000 of them would welcome any opportunity for educating themselves for their work, observation shows, and his investigations have revealed that in 140 cities in the United States, where 171 colleges and universities are located, 1,800 of these young policemen want to go to college.

Duty to Train Police

"Because of the magnitude of the problem of crime," Mr. Ragsdale observes, "and because the solution of great problems must be met by educational effort, the educational institutions of the country have a duty and responsibility to make some organized effort toward the training of these men.

"Sooner or later, universities will come to have regular departments of police science; they will lay down required courses for police certificates and later, perhaps, for degrees in police science. When this is done, the crime problem will be near solution than at present. When the police vocation has been raised into a profession, when police begin to use all that physical science and philosophy can bring to them in their work, the criminal will have less chance to get away with his nefarious work."

Mr. Ragsdale, who has studied police departments here and abroad, aided in the establishment of large city police schools, and laid out courses for the University of Louisville, believes colleges would be doing their communities a great service by "putting the college stamp on the policeman." To this end, he believes scholarships might be offered to worthy young men in the departments who may thus be better fitted to become the leaders of the guardians of property and human life in the future.

Imperial Messenger Visits S. Manchuria

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

JEHOL, Feb. 17—Colonel Yasushi Sakai, Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty the Japanese Emperor, who arrived here from Chiehfeng at 2 p.m. today conveyed the gracious message he had brought from Tokyo to the Japanese garrison forces stationed here. Staying here overnight, the Imperial messenger will leave here by airplane for Shanhaikuan at 9 a.m. tomorrow.

Prior to his arrival here today, Colonel Sakai stopped at Chinchow, Chaoyang and Chiehfeng to communicate His Majesty's gracious wishes to the Japanese troops stationed in those districts, it is revealed.

Just What Is Correct Time? It's Not Simple

get, so to speak, is absolutely correct.

Calculation

But to quit speculation, for a moment.

The principal source of all knowledge of the correct time in the United States is the Naval Observatory at Arlington, Va. The observatory is, in effect, the master clock of the country. Its calculations are made by the stars; and Western Union, the commercial radio systems which give periodic time signals, the telephone company, all get their information from it.

In every place where time may be obtained from Western Union, the company has a master clock which governs all the clocks it uses itself, or those it rents to other people. Western Union keeps an unbroken check with the Naval Observatory.

Near and Nearer

Every watch-repair shop of any importance has a time-service ticker, serviced by Western Union and supplied at a nominal cost. It is the closest thing to the absolute of "correct time" to be found, because while it is possible for the time-service tickers to get a few seconds off, they are constantly corrected, and synchronized with the master clock.

For general purposes, a watchmaker considers a watch as accurate which steadily maintains the time within two or three seconds of the time-ticker signal. To research people, and a small minority to whom time is more than a mere interval between two stations on the face of a clock, that might not be close enough. For them, there are various auxiliary instruments such as the chronometer, the chronograph and so on.

The chronometer is a simple timepiece of special construction which, once adjusted, can be relied on to show the exact rate of the passage of time. The chronograph is just what its name denotes; a mechanism for noting the time in writing, used, or consumed for a definite operation or performance.

Flying

Aviators, many of them, have a special type of watch; in the case of the Longines make, it is known as the Lindbergh watch, because part of the system of dialing was based on a recommendation made by Colonel Lindbergh for a watch which would help fliers to bulwark the normal minute and second hands with a checking device. This, and it is usually a wrist watch, has a center, adjustable dial with seconds divisions; and the dial can be moved to synchronize with the seconds hand of the watch itself by the Arlington time signal.

Radio

Time, as given over the radio, is as correct as it can possibly be, based on the exact knowledge behind the Arlington time signals, and subject only to possibly slight—very slight—variation, due to human equations involved in transmission. The same is true of time as supplied by Western Union or the Telephone Company, because they all get their information for public dissemination from the same source.

Outside the Law

As for laws governing the standard of accuracy that must be maintained by any service supplying the time to the public, there are none. Such a thing is not conceivable, but if some Puck should get loose in the Western Union or the telephone companies and take to telling inquirers that it was 2:30 p. m. when it was really only 11:37½ a. m., he could probably be dealt with effectively; but it would not be by the summoning of any statute, for there is none covering such matters.

In Railroad Stations

People sometimes wonder if the railroad station clocks in, say, New York—at the Grand Central and at the Pennsylvania—show identical time at a given instant. Presumably they do, though it would be pretty hard to tally them; as who is going to be in both places at once? or how is the respiration of two persons, one at either end of a telephone line, comparing notes, going to be synchronized, so that, as they compare, no fragment of a second may be lost?

In this case, there probably is no great difference; nevertheless, with clocks in certain public places, it does happen that there are variations.

A clock on a church steeple or a public building, for instance, whose hands are actually and completely exposed to wind and weather, is bound to be affected: it may be periodically slow or fast. The clock on the Paramount building in New York is an example of what the wind can do to an instrument whose modest intention is merely to tell the time. Whether or not the tower is unfortunately situated, on some days, you can see the wind drive the hands of the clock forward or back, and, when the wind dies down, see the clock hands swing into their own again.

Accepting It

So it is pretty futile to get stirred up about how correct the correct time is.

In the first place, is it the time itself that we care about, or is it what we must do with time?

In the second place, suppose we live by a clock that is three or four seconds off the absolute of time?

What can we do?

Sue?

And whom?

Just Because

A young man took his grandmother to the pictures. After ten minutes the old lady wanted to go out.

"The seat's so uncomfortable," she complained.

"No wonder," he exclaimed. "You haven't turned it down."—Montreal Star.

America In Quest Of Foreign Policy

United States against war, thus using the same term which a high Belgian authority used to this writer in Brussels recently in explaining Belgium's neutrality policy. Little Belgium, surrounded by powerful neighbors, and the great United States, geographically remote from the danger zone, both seek the same end: immunity from war, if immunity is possible.

There is a notable similarity also between American aims and British; even between the American and the British attitudes toward Europe. The British look upon the Continent with much the same bewilderment and despair that Americans exhibit. There is this vital difference: America is 3,000 miles away, Britain thirty miles away.

Consequently, Britain, much as she would like to, can hardly contemplate assuming a posture of disdainful aloofness. Her policy must look not to isolation but to prevention.

Prevention of war in Europe is regarded by many in Congress as a hopeless task. The neutrality measures proposed seem to have grown from the conviction that Europe is headed for war and nothing can stop her; that America could not save Europe and hence must think of saving herself.

Far From Kellogg Pact

We have come a long way from the Stimson doctrine which held that neutrality was obsolete and that the Kellogg Pact made it impossible for its signatories to be indifferent to aggression. For the proposed policy involves an attitude of official indifference to the merits of any war, though its sponsors admit they might not be emotionally indifferent. Some of them concede that a struggle between a Fascist and a democratic State would find American sympathies on the side of the free nation, but they believe those sympathies would not be so strong as to offset the desire to remain officially neutral.

They realize, too, that rigid neutrality which forbade supplying any belligerents might actually favor Fascist Germany as against the democratic powers who control the seas and otherwise would have access to our markets. But, as one Senator said, "that's none of our business."

Thus it appears that the desire to keep out of war is so strong that in many cases it leaves no room for great concern about the fate of democracy in Europe as opposed to fascism or communism.

The neutrality law had to be revised to meet the Spanish situation and almost certainly would need to be recast if a major conflict broke out. So American foreign policy, however nicely Congress may define it, is likely for a long time—even as British foreign policy—to depend upon quick improvisation and to remain the objective of an endless quest.

Lonely Women In America May Hire Handsome Guides

'Escort' Service Proves Extremely Popular And Profitable

By FREDERICK L. COLLINS

Liberty

"I'm in New York for 48 hours," purred the young widow, "and I don't want to sleep."

That was easy for Ted Peckham, founder of the Guide Escort Bureau, whose scores of personably youths are at the disposal of unescorted women who wish to see the town. In this case Peckham had three of his boys work in relays. For two days and nights the widow didn't stop whirling on a continuous round of gaiety.

"We solve the extra-man problem—the fourth at bridge and that sort of thing," Peckham told me. "Recently we furnished 50 stags for one big society party. We do a big business with steamship people for short cruises. We even had a call for boys from Claridge's in London."

Peckham, the originator of a service now being copied in many cities, is 23 and industrious. Between classes at Western Reserve University he ran a supper club in a Cleveland hotel, wrote a society column, bought and sold secondhand clothes and rented bicycles. Later, it was he who persuaded the New Haven Railroad to put on those week-end cycle trains—with cycles by Peckham.

When he came to New York to make his fortune, various jobs with $15 a week as top salary was the best he could do. Then, one night, on Fifth Avenue, listening to the dance music in a hotel and wishing he were inside, he got his big idea—that women alone in a great city need help to see the sights and night life.

"I went to the leading hotels with the idea," Peckham said. "They ate it up. One of their greatest problems is women guests who want to go places but have nobody to go with them. Thus, the Guide Escort Bureau was started."

Successful business women, in New York once a month or so, are among the Bureau's most regular customers. Out-of-town women of wealth and social position are equally well represented; and there are many local clients.

"Generally speaking," Peckham says, "the older a woman is, the later she keeps the boys up. Clients 18 to 25 years of age usually go to their waiting families at a reasonable hour. Those 45 to 70 want to stay out all night.

"I try to bring congenial people together. A woman who plays bridge or golf naturally likes a companion who can talk those games. Then, too, some women have very definite ideas about the appearance of their escort—ladies seeming to prefer blonds by a two to one ratio."

Peckham chooses his fair client's corsage and has it delivered to her, reserves tables at restaurants and night clubs, makes theater reservations—plans the entire evening. For all this service he collects $5 if the boy wears a dinner coat, $10 if he wears tails, and an additional fee if he stays out all night. Special rates are quoted on summer cruises. The client, of course, pays all expenses. Peckham also has five professional women shoppers who charge $10 for a full day, five interpreters, and a few child guardians.

Cardinal rules for escorts are: don't get tight, affectionate, or confidentially loquacious. The boys get a weekly salary and bonus, the latter depending on how long they work. Most of them have daytime jobs and can't stand more than three nights' escorting a week. Many of them get presents from customers; gifts have ranged from radios and chow dogs to a farm in New Hampshire.

"But we're not running a gigolo business," Peckham stated firmly. "Our boys must be good dancers but they must be good fellows, too. I stick for the most part to Yale, Harvard and Princeton boys because the names mean something to the customers, and every boy must be in the Social Register. It shows the woman that her escort has a certain reputation to maintain."

Despite about 500 letters a week from boys seeking jobs, the university clubs of New York are Peckham's chief source of supply. Boys with the requisite standing and character are put through a thorough schooling. They must be interesting conversationalists, notice their companion's clothes, be able to point out celebrities, and, most important, they must not drink to excess. Peckham has spotters in restaurants and clubs; if a boy misbehaves, he never goes out again under the Peckham banner.

From The Literary Digest:

A Peckham escort must never enter his client's apartment or hotel room, never be in any room with her, unless there are three others present. If the client gets drunk the escort must call the headwaiter, place his partner in the care of the restaurant staff, and leave. Peckham's men may nod to friends when on duty but never introduce their friends to clients.

Arranging for the service is simple. After ascertaining where the client would like to go and what type of man she wants, Peckham reads his listing until she picks her choice. The meeting of client and escort is easy, informal. The escort merely announces himself at her address and when she appears they shake hands. While taxiing to their first stop, she hands him two envelopes containing his fee and expense money.

Following Peckham's lead, rival services are already being set up. In Philadelphia, George Washington Hyam, ex-ad man, has selected 30 college men and opened the city's first Guide and Escort Service. In Washington, Lewis A. Nuckols, a former William and Mary student, has employed 18 men "conversant on current topics" for his Erudito Guide and Escort Service. Nuckols is exceedingly sanguine as Washington has a ratio of five females to two males.

Peckham himself is starting branches this winter in Palm Beach, Seattle and Chicago. He also plans to have offices in England and on the Continent. Recently, on a trip to Paris, needy French noblemen battered at his hotel door. He had advertised for several "nice French dukes and about 100 young men from the Almanach de Gotha" with which to open his Paris branch.

"My escorts must be real noblemen," he told them. "I want dukes especially, since the Duke of Windsor has given a new stimulus to that title."

A Brief Biography of Josai-Daishi, Founder of the Sojiji

By Dr. S. TACHIBANA

The Young East

The Zenshu or 'School of Meditation' was introduced into China in 520 A.D. by Bodhi-Dharma (died 528), an Indian prince monk. Between the 9th and 11th centuries, there in China arose many sects and subsects of it, of which only 3, Rinzai, Soto, and Obaku, were ever introduced into this country. The Sotoshu was brought in 1227 by Dogen the Dhyana-master (1200-1253), commonly known by his posthumous title, Joyo-Daishi. He founded the Eiheiji, one of the 2 head monasteries of the Sotoshu, in the Province of Echizen (present Fukui-Ken) and is regarded as the first Patriarch of the sect in Japan. He was succeeded by Ejo (1198-1280), Gikai (1231-1309), and Keizan, alias Josai-Daishi, the 4th Patriarch and founder of the Sojiji, the sister head monastery of the Eiheiji. He will be called the Daishi in the following pages.

The Daishi was born on November 21, of the 5th year of the Bunei era (1268), at Tane village of Echizen Province. His mother, who died at 87 years of age, had an image of the elevenfaced Kwannon (Avalokitesvara-Bodhisattva), which she had found in a miraculous way, when she was quite young. Once her mother being lost could not be traced for some days. She worried very much about her, and as she was a staunch worshipper of Kwannon, she made daily visits to the temple of Kiyomizu, Kyoto. In her 6th visit, she picked up something strange on the way, and on examination she knew to her great surprise and joy that it was a head of the Bodhisattva. In one or two days her mother being found she got a body of the Bosatsu made suitable for the head, as a token of thanks to him. She kept it on her person through her long life; and quite naturally the Daishi's life was also interwoven with the belief in Kwannon.

Pious as she had been in her daily routine, from the very moment that she became conscious of being with child, she took greater care of herself than ever, physically and mentally. She invoked the elevenfaced Kwannon, her tutelary Bosatsu, praying him, not for her own sake at all, for instance, her easy parturition, but entirely for her child's sake. May it be born wise and holy! May it be born as a savior of the world; If not, may it be still-born! Such were her prayers. She is said to have paid homage to the Bodhisattva 333 times and read the Samantamukha-parivarta, a well known Sutra, in which the Bosatsu is praised in many ways as a savior of all sentient beings, 33 times every day. The Daishi's birthplace is known as the village of Tane, which though impossible to be identified today, is said to have had a temple of Kwannon. As Queen Maya gave birth to Gautama the Buddha in Lumbini Garden, on her way to her native town, so the Daishi's mother was suddenly in throes while out. The child, therefore, was first named Gyosho or 'Born-while-walking.'

In the Province of Echizen there were many well known Buddhist monasteries, e.g. Hogenji, which belonged to the Enryakuji of Omi Province, and around which in ancient days 500 monkish cells stood, Heisenji, one of the largest monasteries of Echizen, belonging to the same head monastery, and many other. There monasteries kept large numbers of monk-soldiers, who bow and arrow in hand conducted themselves in unruly manners giving great trouble to other people. The Eiheiji also found itself in the same Province, but far different from these monasteries, it was regarded as a true cloister of monks for their mental cultivation. The first Patriarch was dead then, but the 2nd Ejo and the 3rd Gikai being still alive were busy in training monks, whether young or old. The Hogenji, Heisenji and other large monasteries of the Province once were the centers of faith through the power of prayers and incantations, but the faith of people in general having been completely marred by the lawless acts of monk-soldiers and other invaders, it was quite natural that their attention was attracted by some other religious faith.

Far previous to the year (1268), in which the Daishi was born and which roughly coincides with the middle of the Kamakura Period, Yoritomo, a hero of the Minamoto family, utterly crushed the Tairas as the final flow of the long continued struggle between the two families; became the first Shogun or Generalissimo; opened the Bakufu or Camp-governments at Kamakura; appointed protectors of Provinces and lords of manors; and thus placed the whole country under his sole sway. The Minamotos however were ruined in turn, and in these years the Hojos were real rulers of the country, though in a rather lower position of Shikken or regents. When Hojo Tokimune was a Shikken, a Korean Bampu came over to this country as a messenger from the Mongolian monarch, Kublai Khan (1216-94), who at the head of an almost invincible army ruined every king or nation on the continent, that came in contact with him. The letter he brought with him was naturally full of insolent words. Tokimune did not answer to it, but sent more soldiers to Kyushu or the south-western part of Japan to protect it against the Mongols. The Kublai sent another messenger next year, who was followed by 3 or 4 others, and in 1278 20,000 Mongolian sailors on board of 900 battleships raided Iki and Tsushima, 2 islands near Kyushu and also Hakata (present Fukuoka), but thanks to the terrible storms which burst out all of a sudden, the whole hands without single exception went to the bottom of the sea. The next year, another Mongolian Toseichu came with credentials from his monarch; but Tokimune captured and killed him at Tatsunokuchi, near Kamakura to a great surprise of the nation, who however felt relieved do some extent. The Daishi, who was then only 8 years old, was sent to the Eiheiji to be made a novice there. He could not have known anything of the national danger; but it may not be to much to suppose that the popularity of Tokimune, stimulated his infantile mind in some degree. His brave deeds were regarded as resulting from the mental culture he had received at the hands of Zen teachers, one of whom was Doryu-Rankei, who was invited from China upon the recommendation of Joyo-Daishi. It is therefore quite natural that Tokimune's acts greatly moved the minds of the Echizen people, and made them to aspire after Zen cultivation. The Daishi on being taken to the Eiheiji saw the Abbot Gikai at the Yobodo, a sort of infirmary, which he had built near the monastery for the purpose of nursing his aged mother.

Five years later, the ex-Abbot Ejo conferred upon him the Daijo-Bosatsu-Kai or 'Precepts of the Mahayana School.' He might now be called a Bodhisattva who started a new life with a view to attaining to Bodhi or enlightenment. The ex-Abbot on this occasion observed: "This novice, though quite young, behaves himself like a grown-up person; in years to come he as a leader of men and gods will raise our sect to a flourishing state." He is said further to have taken great care in training this precocious child. He was put under the training of the present Abbot for serveral years, for the ex-Abbot had died a short while after the bestowal of the Bodhisattva precepts; and it was at 18 years of his age that he went out in expectation of finding good teachers everythere throughout the country. During this itineracy he went from Echizen to Kyoto and its vicinity, and he visited all prominent monks who were known to be masters of Zen in those days. Three years later he came back to his master Gikai. One day while he was reading the Hokkekyo or Saddharma-Pundarika-Sutra, his eyes being attracted by a passage, "One can see all things in 3,000 universes with the natural carnal eyes 'born of father and mother," he became enlightened. One day his master laid before the assembly of his disciples the conversation which had passed between Nansen and his pupil Joshuu, 2 prominent monks in the Tang Dynasty. Joshu asked his master Nansen what the Tao (way) was, to which Nansen's reply was: "The mind in everyday life is the way itself." What was meant by this question and answer, striking the Daishi's mind, he came to enlightenment, which he expressed with these words: 'A pitch black ball rolls into a dark night.'—'That is not enough, say more.'—'Let one take tea, if one gets it, and let one take rice, if he gets it.'

In 1295, when he was 28 years old, he became Abbot of the Jomanji, of Awa Province, Shikoku Island. In his lifetime he founded and presided over all 6 monasteries, and this was the first of them. In the winter of the following year, he conferred upon 5 monks 'precepts of the Bodhisattva,' his first experience, comparable with the Lord Buddha's 'Turning the Wheel of the Religious Law' at Benares, as a result of which, as is well known, as many monks were converted into the Buddha's religion. In 1299 his master being too old to lead his disciples called him back from Awa to Kaga, and told him to become Abbot of the Daijoji taking his place. In the same year Gasan, a Tendai monk, who was older than he, became his follower. The Denkoroku or 'Records of Transmitting Light' are notes of lectures he gave in these years about the words and deeds of the Buddha and successive Patriarchs in India, China, and Japan. In 1311 he became Abbot of the Jojuji, and thanks to monks' and laymen's devotion to his personality, in the course of the following 10 years, the Kokoji, Yokoji, and Sojiji were newly founded or converted from some other sects, and the most important of these is the last. In the village of Kushihi, of Noto Province, there was a temple of Kwannon belonging to the Vinaya-sect, of the name of Shogakuji. The Abbot Joken one night dreamed that the chief figure Kwannon emitting benign rays of compassion told him to make the temple over to the Daishi. As a result of this dream the temple was offered to him, and called Shogakuzan Sojiji.

In 1321, when he was 54 years old, the then reigning Emperor Godaigo-tenno hearing of his wide spread religious fame sent a messenger to ask of him the following 10 questions: (1) Are Zen Buddhism and doctrinal Buddhism the same or different? (2) Bodhi-Dharma is seen standing on a reed leaf floating on the water. How could such a miracle be possible? (3) Zen Buddhism insists that letters are not to be attached to, and the very thing that is to be transmitted is besides doctrines. If letters are thus nullified, how can the teachings of Buddhas and Patriarchs be transmitted? (4) When one dies, all that composes one's body is separated to its elements. What is it then that falls into hell? (5) People offer food and drink to the spirits of dead parents; are they really accepted by them? (6) The wise may attain to Bodhiship; but how can the ignorant realize enlightenment? (7) It is said in the Vajracchedika-Sutra that all Buddhas and perfect enlightenment they have reached come out of this Sutra. But the Sutra itself is what was taught by Sakyamuni. Now which was the first, the Sutra or the Buddha? (8) Mahabhijnajnabhibhu-Buddha is said to have sat on as long as 10 Kalpas, but failed to attain to Bodhiship. How can a modern man realize Buddhaship, even if he sits on all his life? (9) It is said in a Sutra that a recluse in perfect accordance with religious discipline does not realize Nirvana, while a monk of defiled morality does not fall into hell. Why is it so? (10) I have attempted to solve the question of 'Nothingness' put forth by Joshu for some years, but to my great regret I have so far been unable to succeed in it. How can it be fully solved? The answers the Daishi gave to these questions were approved by the Emperor so much that he conferred a purple robe as a token of high esteem on him, and a tablet with 3 big characters 'SO-JI-JI' on the monastery. The following year the Emperor received the precepts at the hand of the Daishi, and the Sojiji was promoted to the rank of an official monastery, as high as the Nanzenji, a Rinzai monastery, which previously had been put in the highest rank of all Zen monasteries in Japan. It was made by the same Emperor the chief monastery of the whole sect, and the holy seat where Soto monks might get fully ordained.

In the middle of September, 1325, when he was taken ill and became aware of being near his end, he assembled his disciples, monkish and lay, preached a sermon on a Sutra, as the Buddha and the first Patriarch did at their death-beds; he made a religious service for his dead master be performed; and on November 21, taking a writing brush in his hand, he wrote a death-bed poem, which done he calmly expired in sitting posture.

Y3,000,000 Spent For Golf Balls By Japan During Year

New Company Sets Out To Manufacture Product Locally

Japanese golfers spent more than three and a half million yen last year in buying foreign made golf-balls, according to Mr. Tsunegoro Chiba, president of the Dai Nippon Golf Ball Company. As can be seen from this, golf is becoming extremely popular in Japan, and there are said to be nearly 200,000 golfers in the country, although there are no accurate statistics and some place the figure at a little over 100,000.

"It is to stop this enormous import of foreign golf balls that I have started the manufacture of the Evergreen Golf Ball," said Mr. Chiba.

Mr. Chiba is one of the prominent golfers of the country. After graduating from Keio University, he went to the United States and studied at Amherst. He took up golf while in the United States and upon his return home, he established a company to manufacture golf balls. His company has just put Evergreen balls on the market. Although there are other makes of golf balls produced in Japan, Mr. Chiba believes that Evergreen is the best made in this country.

No Reliable Statistics

"Golf was first introduced to Japan soon after the Russo-Japanese War," said Mr. Chiba, "but it was about in 1910 that golf began to attract the public in this country. Then in these ten years or so, it has rapidly become popular. Now, there are not only many good professional men golfers, but women, and students are also playing. The total number of golfers is hard to state as there are no statistics, but I think there are about 200,000. Some people say there are only about 100,000. There are 95 golf courses in Japan proper, Chosen, Taiwan, and Manchoukuo. In the immediate vicinity of Tokyo, there are more than 30 courses, many of which are just as good as the best in other countries.

"Some clubs have more than a thousand membership, but most of the clubs have about 500 members each. Around Tokyo there are the Tokyo, Hodogaya, Sagami, Musashino, Kasumigaseki, Takanodai, Fujisawa, and Abiko clubs. Then there are Kawana (near Ito), Karuizawa, Sengokubara, and Fuji-Nasu courses. In the Kansai district there are the Ebaraki, Hirono, Naruo, Takarazuka, Kyoto, Nagoya, and Osaka clubs. Okayama, Hiroshima, Beppu, Unzen, Nagasaki, and other cities have courses. In Manchoukuo there are courses at Hoshigaura, Harbin, Mukden, Hsinking, Port Arthur, and also there are several in Taiwan.

"Golf has been called an expensive sport. It was so years ago, but now very good golf clubs are manufactured in Japan and the sport is no longer expensive. But as to the manufacture of balls, we made little progress, and thus more than ¥3,500,000 is annually spent in buying foreign balls. The manufacture of golf balls is very difficult and delicate. The longest record of a drive made by a golfer is 360 yards, and the ball was in the air more than 11 seconds.

Used Crude Balls

"The modern golf ball is only about 40 years old, and it is not clearly known what kind of balls they used in earlier days. But I think in olden days the ball must have been a very crude one.

"Golf is generally said to be an ancient Scotch game, but lately it is reported that some South Americans have an ancient game which is quite similar to golf, and thus it might have originally come from South America.

"I have started to make golf balls, primarily from my hope to stop imports, but at the same time I aim at the production of the best golf ball in the world. I know there are many difficulties, and I may not succeed in doing so, but yet I am proceeding toward that distant object."

The Evergreen ball produced by the Dai Nippon Golf Ball Company has been placed on the market since February 11, and it has been already highly recommended by professionals and many prominent amateur players.

Whatever Happened?

A certain Nonconformist minister, who was very popular with his congregation in the little Midland town in which he lived, received an invitation to preach a Christmas sermon in a Church of England pulpit.

When he was telling a member of his own congregation afterwards, he remarked that he had had to wear a cassock.

"Well," said his friend, "that didn't matter did it?"

"No, not exactly," replied the minister, "but it was a bitterly cold day, and you can't think how glad I was to get into my trousers again."

The Test

Said Isaacs to Solomon, "So, my boy, you vant to marry my daughter, eh? Vell tell me, could you lend me von thousan' poun's vithout security?"

Vy yes," said Solomon, "I could—but I vouldn't."

To which Isaacs replied, "Very vell, you can marry my daughter. I vould trust her vith any man who showed a spirit like that."

Lateness To Dates In China Breaks No Rules Of 'Kutchee'

Christian Science Monitor

SHANGHAI—Miss Emily Hahn, author of a number of books and many magazine articles published in America, contributes to the China Critic magazine of Shanghai an amusing discourse on Chinese procrastination, in which she maintains that Occidentals and Orientals are trained in a different time concept from the cradle upward.

"In my world," says she, "we live by an imperfect philosophy and our lives are too dependent upon space-time, and so upon other people. In other words, when you have promised to lunch with me at 12 o'clock at the Rainbow on Thursday, the only thing which has been accomplished, to my mind, is that several words have been spoken between us. I make note of these words, I set them aside in the part of my brain marked 'Yet to be done' but I form no opinion in advance, because I am a slave of Time and accustomed to use such phrases as 'in advance.' The lunch, to me, has not yet occurred, and so I do not consider it as more than a future occasion fraught with possibilities.

As Good as Done

"But to you, everything is merged in 'Things as they are.' We have arranged a lunch together? Splendid! Then, you think, in a world of pleasant happenings, all drifting about in a shoreless sea of spacetime, there is among other occasions this lunch of ours together. It is here—future, present, past, what does it matter?—the lunch is here, and since there is no future or present, or past, it is quite one whether the lunch has yet to be eaten, or is being eaten now, or was eaten last week. The whole importance of this lunch is that the idea has already been conceived. It is as good as done. Life is the better for that lunch. It was very clever of me to have thought of it.

"Therefore, when Thursday comes and I am there complete with handbag, appetite and my tiresome Western slave-complex of Time, perhaps you will come and perhaps not. Another potentiality may have impinged upon our relations just at 12 o'clock on Thursday (or what I call 12 o'clock) and you have perhaps encountered some other action, or rather some other action may have encountered you, so that you do not drift over the surface of that sea in my direction just at 12 o'clock—on Thursday. I comfort myself with this reflection; I feed my appetite upon strange fodder."

Miss Hahn confesses that in this line of reasoning, a Chinese friend has insisted that she is wrong and that everyone is alike. His idea is that it is all a matter of politeness, or "kutchee."

"It seems that what we call rudeness is what the Chinese call love, and that if a guest who has been invited by me to dinner, for example, fails to arrive, it is only because he is such a good friend of mine. . . ."

Friends who fail to arrive do so, in short, because they feel they can regretfully give up another friend's company in favor of some other less well known because they must be more polite to the strangers.

Comments Miss Hahn:

"'That is rudeness,' I say angrily.

"'Not at all," says my Chinese friend, 'that is intimacy."

Iceland Parliamentary Set Of Stamps

One of the most unusual postal issues of recent years is the Iceland parliamentary set of 1930. Beautifully printed in a variety of soft pleasing colors, these stamps are not only an artistic achievement in themselves, but also recall the story of the founding of Iceland—that strange, half-legendary island in the North Atlantic which is known to the rest of the world mainly for its bleak and rugged scenery, its hot springs, geysers and volcanoes.

Not so generally known, however, is the fact that Iceland has the oldest representative government in the world. The Icelandic parliament, or "Althing" was first established in the year 930, and the hardy Icelanders elected their own rulers and bishops in democratic fashion at a time when the people of Europe were at the mercy of ruthless and despotic kings. In 1930 the 1000th anniversary of this ancient institution was celebrated with much ceremony and commemorated by a special issue of 16 stamps. The 3a value of this series shows the present parliament house, and the 7a value pictures the last meeting-place of the Althing as it appeared in 1690.

Iceland was first discovered and settled in the 9th century by the sea-roving Vikings of Norway and Sweden, and these great yellow-bearded heroes figure prominently in the old Icelandic sages. Terrible fighters and pillagers they were, and coast dwellers of all Europe as far south as Spain dreaded the sight of the square, painted sails of the Viking galleys. A Viking ship in a storm is shown on the 5a stamp, and another of these low, black-hulled vessels appears in the scene on the 10a stamp depicting a Viking funeral. Two bearded chieftains on the 15a are seen in the act of naming Iceland; and the 20a represents 'The Dash for Thing' an episode in Icelandic history similar to the homestead rush in the United States.

The City of Danzig has recently issued five stamps for the benefit of the Winter Relief Fund. This attractive series is printed in soft antique shades and illustrates some of the old city's most famous buildings, dating from the days of her greatness as one of the chief ports in the Hanseatic League.

One of the old gates of the city, the Milchkannenturm (Milk Can Tower) which was built between 1517 and 1519, is shown upon the 10pf + 5pf light blue. Another famous gate, the Frauentor (Ladies' Gate) dates from 1482 and appears on the 15pf+5pf dark green. Its lofty pointed gables are quite typical of the city's mediaeval architecture.

The 25pf+10pf red brown shows the ancient Krantor (Windlass Gate) which was built in 1443. Danzig is connected with the sea by the river Mottlau, which flows through the very center of the city. Danzig's main streets lead to great warehouses on the river-side and end in elaborate gateways, of which the Frauentor and the Krantor are only two. The Krantor takes its name from a cumbersome old tread-wheel windlass which was formerly used to hoist cargo out of waiting ships.

The Langarter Tor and a view of the more modern part of the city is brought to us on the 40pf + 20pf light brown. Perhaps the most famous of Danzig's architectural landmarks, however, is the Hohe Tor (High Gate) which is pictured on the 50pf + 20pf deep blue.

Modelled after a Roman Triumphant arch, the Hohe Tor was erected in 1588 and leads directly to the main thorough-fare of the city. At this historic gate the Polish kings were formerly received on their annual visits to Danzig, and the Royal Polish coat-of-arms above the central arch still remains to show that the Free City was once under Poland's sovereignty.

Throughout the world the lion has been considered a traditional symbol of strength and courage, and no less than twenty-six different countries have found a place for him on their postage stamps. The ½ anna stamp from the Indian native state of Soruth shows a splendid maned lion of the type which is still found, though in diminishing numbers, in the Gir district of northwestern India.

The lion is most plentiful today in the wide, rolling plains of East Africa where the large quantities of antelope and other games assure the beast of a constant food supply. Full-grown lions are generally eight to ten feet long from the tip of their nose to the tip of their tail, but not all of them possess the majestic mane which is represented on the Gir specimens. All of them, however, are remarkable for a peculiar tuft on the end of their tail, and the credulous writers of other times said that this tuft concealed a sharp spike with which the lion literally lashed himself into a frenzy before attacking his prey.

How Hawaii Abolished Objectionable Signs

By FRED C. KELLY

The Reader's Digest

The flowering trees and shrubs along highways throughout the Hawaiian Islands offer a glowing contrast to the blatant billboards which afflict the motorist in other parts of the United States. Many of us on the mainland complain about the state of our highways and wonder why something isn't done about it. In our island Territory, something has been done. Billboards and disfiguring signs have been completely eliminated from Hawaii, not by law but by social pressure.

Perhaps the completeness of the victory in the islands in contrast to minor and piecemeal successes elsewhere was due to the fact that the sigh makers were most ruthless in exploiting that region of great natural beauty and set up elements of their own destruction. Some ten years ago, the attractive streets of Honolulu were becoming a procession of defacements. Signboards threatened to destroy the native beauty of the countryside. The situation was so bad that the fighting spirit of a group of women, called the Outdoor Circle, was aroused. They were finally spurred into action by one advertiser who erected a huge billboard on the main road between Honolulu and Waikiki beach. There were other signboards equally obnoxious, but this proved to be the last straw. The women of the Outdoor Circle bought newspaper space to announce that they would refuse to buy any articles thus advertised, and called upon all women in Hawaii to join them in the boycott. They pointed out to the advertisers that whatever was destructive of Hawaiian charm was detrimental to the whole community.

Thousands of women enlisted in the boycott and dealers began to note sharp declines in the sales of certain articles. Gradually it dawned on the advertisers that billboards which were driving away business had better be removed. In a surprisingly short time they began to disappear, and eventually they were completely eliminated from the whole Territory. General satisfaction in the achievement is so great that Samuel Wilder King, Terri-

Eden Declares Intervention Is Bad Humanity

Would Probably Prolong Frightful Conflict In Spain, Commons Told

When Mr. Eden rose in the Commons to make his promised statement on foreign policy, the House immediately filled to overflowing and a distinguished audience, including the French and Russian Ambassadors and Lord Plymouth, Chairman of the Non-Intervention Committee, entered the galleries, says the London Times

Mr. Eden spoke with more emphasis and inflection than usual, and used a full measure of open diplomacy. His initial appeal that Parliament during 1937 should be a Council of State on foreign policy gained force from the undeniable fact that nobody seriously challenged the principles which he laid down.

Dealing first with Spain, he reported that the risk that the civil war there would involve a European war was definitely less; though he feared that foreign intervention would probably prolong a frightful conflict in Spain itself. That intervention was bad humanity and bad politics, because nothing was more certain than that 24,000,000 proud Spaniards would never tolerate the domination of any Power or pair of Powers. In particular, Mr. Eden roundly denied that the recent Anglo-Italian declaration would justify Italian intervention against any Government in any part of Spain. This scarcely veiled reference to rumored Italian views about Catalonia was reinforced by the phrase that in the British view that character of the Spanish Government should be decided by the Spanish people and by no one else.

Seeking Agreement

Turning to the question of volunteers, Mr. Eden admitted that it might well have been dealt with in the earlier stages of non-intervention. But in general he claimed that non-intervention was the popular and right policy, though it had been gravely impaired. The Government had therefore tried to turn to advantage the elements of agreement in the replies to the Anglo-French demarche on Christmas Eve. They had asked for a definite date for the general stoppage of volunteers. Having favorably noted the French, Portuguese, and Russian replies from Germany and Italy were expected within 48 hours. Meanwhile the planning of a scheme of control, independent of Spanish consent, was far advanced under the constructive pertinacity of Lord Plymouth.

In this connection, the British reminder of the legal effect here of the Foreign Enlistment Act was not the sacrifice of a lever upon other countries.

Power To Make or Mar

In the final and most solemnly pronounced portion of his speech, Mr. Eden begged Nazi Germany to consider whither she was going. A mighty people in the heart of Europe had the power to make or mar the future of that continent. Germany had the choice between collaborating with a world sick of feuds and devoting herself to sharpening antagonisms and intensifying her own isolation. If she chose collaboration, all would help.

But pacts and pacific speeches were not enough. Acts alone counted. There must be the unmistakable will to cooperate. That will could show itself in abandoning the doctrine of national exclusiveness and accepting every European State as a potential partner in a general settlement; by reducing armaments to a level sufficient for the essential needs of defense; and by accepting such international machinery for settling disputes as would make the League of Nations a benefit to all and a servitude to none. In short, economic collaboration and political appeasement were indivisible. There could be no cash or concessions if the result was only more armaments and more trouble. For our part, the Government held that the re-equipment of our defenses was indispensable, but only as a means to secure the end of smaller armaments and better living conditions all over the world.

Mr. Attlee could hardly challenge these views, but he accused the Government of secretly favoring General Franco, and he refused to believe that Fascist Powers could be trusted to keep their word. The Labor Party held that the only legitimate Spanish Government should now be given a right to buy arms, and that non-intervention should be abandoned if a satisfactorily controllable agreement were not signed by a fixed date. A belief in democracy meant standing up to dictators.

Sir Archibald Sinclair took the same line, and bitterly resented Signor Mussolini's dictum that democracies were done for. He declared that if the dictators did not stop intervention in Spain, France and Great Britain together should show them that democracies were not done for by taking measures to stop foreign intervention. Mr. Eden seemed to be a wise but weak man struggling with an unwise Cabinet.

On the other side, General Franco found a stout supporter in Mr. Crossley, one of several members who had been to Spain. He reported that intervention was now general on both sides, but that General Franco's movement was a Spanish movement and, if he won, foreign domination would not be tolerated; and Mr. Logan, a Catholic Labor member, seemed inclined to agree with this view. Mr. Maxton, however, was naturally strongly for the Popular Front.

Mr. D. Grenfell, who has been to Madrid, challenged the accuracy of those who had visited General Franco's side in a speech which clearly impressed the House. The debate ended with an excellent restatement of the Government's policy and difficulties from Lord Cranbourne.

'Inchers' Rival 'Jay-Walkers' In Street Peril

make crossing and thus are more likely to cross with the green light rather than attempt a crossing against the lights."

Obedience to the laws by motorists and pedestrians is the real solution of the traffic problem in this city, according to Elmer Thompson, secretary of the Automobile Club of America.

"The eternal hurry, coupled with refusal to recognize the rights of others, is responsible for a large percentage of accidents," said Mr. Thompson. "Statistics will show that one ruthless driver can imperil many persons in a course extending over a few blocks.

"There is absolutely no excuse for the so-called 'incher,' be he pedestrian or motorist. One is as much of a menace as the other. The driver who intrudes on crosswalks and the pedestrian who scurries through travel against the lights should be subjected to discipline which would prevent repetition of such tactics."

New Road on West Side

A movement for traffic relief, outside of this city, but one which will prove of benefit to motorists here, is the proposed new route from Cornwall to Highlands. This road is offered as an alternative trail to the Storm King Highway. For about four miles the new thoroughfare would pass through the West Point Military Academy.

According to Captain Arthur Brandt, of the State Highway Department, the highway would be about eight miles in length and cost approximately $1,500,000. It would be forty feet wide, with divided pathways and bypass Cornwall and Highlands, thereby allowing motorists to reach Newburgh free from congested travel centers.

"Storm King can no longer meet the demands of modern traffic," said Captain Brandt recently. "It is too narrow and winding and it has been dangerous from rolling stones. There is no way in which it could be widened to handle the increasing flow of travel on the west side of the Hudson."

Bids for construction have already been taken by the State Public Works Department.

Germany Gripped By Anti-Red Drive

even if with the permission of the established government, just as Japan has intervened in China on the same motivation.

"Cold Bolshevization" Opposed

In the light of such considerations the campaign against Czechoslovakia assumes particularly ominous significance, although the immediate purpose of the campaign seems to be to detach Czechoslovakia from the Franco-Soviet combination and to force her, as the West German Beobachter put it, too "find a way out of Moscow's deadly embrace and put a halt to the cold Bolshevization of the country.

There is even more ominous significance in another fact, which lies beyond right and wrong, and that is the fact that among all the nations participatiouig in the armament race Germany and Russia are far out in front. According to Soviet figures as reported in the German press, Russia has increased the expenditures of "the People's Defense Commissariat" from 1,300,000,000 rubles in 1931 to the staggering total of 20,100,000,000 rubles in the current year, and there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of these figures.

This fact, of course, looms bigger on the German horizon than any peace talk in the West. There are indications that Germany is meeting the development by a further increase in her own armaments, especially in respect to her air fleet. According to reliable information, she is scheduled to increase her air fleet in April and the intense activity on new airports suggests that this increase might amount to between 30 and 50 per cent of the present strength. It is a question whether this race can still be stopped without a catastrophe.

Interruption

He was a very absent-minded professor, and while a happy event was taking place, he started to work to taken his mind off things. He became very engrossed, and when the nurse came down later and said: "It's a boy, sir," he remarked testily: "Well, why bother me about it? Isn't my wife at home?"

Blum To Check Increase Of Commodity Prices

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, Feb. 19—In view of the steady increase in commodity prices, the Government has decided to take effective measures to check further rise of prices, Premier Leon Blum declared here today. He revealed that the steps include a comprehensive revision of tariffs but he failed to eleborate the measures in detail.

Meanwhile, Finance Minister Vincent Auriol, at a meeting of Socialist Deputies this afternoon, emphatically denied current rumors that he will resign the portfolio shortly. He assured that he is determined as firmly as ever to continue his efforts, remaining in office, to serve the cause of the Popular Front Cabinet in accordance to the pledge which he had made last June.

FOURTH ENGLISH SPEAKING MEETING

The Fourth English Speaking meeting of the primary schools in Yokohama will be held at the Azuma Primary School, Azumagaoka, Naka-ku, Yokohama at 1:30 p.m. Saturday, February 27. These meetings are held for the purpose of encouraging the study of English in primary schools. Since the organization of these meetings the students' knowledge of English has advanced considerably. Each local primary school will participate in the program of the Fourth Meeting which promises to be even better than previous meetings. All who are interested are invited to attend.

IN HONOR OF WEDDING

On the occasion of the marriage between Lieutenant T. H. Winterborn, language officer of the British Embassy and Miss Beichmann of Norway which takes place today at the Catholic Cathedal, Koishikawa, the Norwegian Minister and Mrs. Finn Koren entertained at luncheon at 1:15 p.m. Wednesday when their guests were Lieutenant T. H. Winterborn, Miss Beichmann; the British Counsellor and Mrs. J. L. Dodds; the British Military Attache and Mrs. Piggott; the British Naval Attache and Mrs. Rawlings; Mr. and Mrs. Beichmann; the British Air Attache and Mrs. Chappell; Consul Cato N. B. Aall; Miss Signe Aall; Mr. F. Piggott; Mrs. E. M. Beichmann; Mr. and Mrs. R. Dahl; Mr. M. Henningsmoen; M. H. T. Bennett; Miss Virginia Bell; Miss Virginia Clive and Mr. Leif B. Buch.

SAIL TODAY

Mr. and Mrs. John Struthers are sailing today at 3 p.m. on the N.Y.K. liner Hiye Maru from Yokohama for Canada from where they will go on to England.

TOKYO ACADEMY OF MUSIC CONCERT

A concert by the Tokyo Academy of Music will be held at the Hibiya Public Hall at 7 p.m. Saturday, at which the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler, the great Austrian composer; Komei Abe's Kleine Suite for Orchestra and Jean Sibelles' The Swan of Tuonela will be presented. The Academy Orchestra will be directed by Professor Klaus Pringsheim.

The program will open with Kleine Suite for Orchestra, Opus 2, by the young Japanese composer, Komei Abe, who was a pupil of Professor Pringsheim's composition classes at the Tokyo Academy of Music from which he graduated a few years ago. His Kleine Suite, which will be heard for the first time in this country at the coming concert, is "Western" in style and form but uses Japanese melodies and is Japanese in spirit and color. Its performance will mark the first instance of a work written by a modern Japanese composer ever to be played in a public concert of the Academy.

The presentation of Mahler's famous composition will be of special interest because Klaus Pringsheim was the pupil of Gustav Mahler in Vienna and is one of the few conductors who were thoroughly initiated by Mahler himself into the spirit and style of his symphonies, and has been recognized as an authoritative Mahler interpreter by musical circles both in Europe and America. Mr. Pringsheim has already introduced all of Mahlers first six symphonies in Japan in concerts with the Academy as well as the New Symphony Orchastra.

in that category, public works contracting with about 13 per cent., the distributive trades service (in which are included numbers of men previously engaged on works specially undertaken for the relief of unemployment) with nearly 6 per cent. These four industries, which account for rather less than 40 per cent. of all the insured men recorded as unemployed, thus include 51 per cent. of the men who have been continuously unemployed for 12 months or more. There is much more short-term unemployment and much less long-term unemployment among women than among men. The cotton industry, the distributive trades, hotel and boarding house service, and the jute industry account for about two-thirds of the long-term unemployment among women.

Industrial Groups

The following table shows the numbers of men and of women unemployed last June for 12 months or more in their industrial groups:—

Other industries and services	63,614	5,059
All industries and services	325,804	19,474
Total	344,778

In 1936 the number of separate individuals with claims during the year was 4,180,000, and the average number of claims current on any one date was 1,487,710, or 35.6 per cent. The Ministry therefore estimates that at the present time persons who are applicants for benefit or assistance are unemployed on the average for approximately one-third of the year. "This figure represents the average amount of unemployment experienced, in the aggregate, during a period of 12 months by persons who claimed benefit or assistance during that period, some of whom were unemployed for a single day only while others are unemployed for the whole year. In a large proportion of cases the aggregate amount of unemployment experienced during the year would consist of a number of separate spells of unemployment separated by periods of employment."

Both the reports appear in the current issue of the Ministry of Labor Gazette.

Franco-German Economic Conversations Postponed

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

BERLIN, Feb. 22—Official announcement was made here today that the Franco-German economic conversations, which were scheduled to get under way here next Thursday, have been postponed until March 3. It was explained that the postponement of the economic talks, which are designed to promote Franco-German trade relations and to settle various outstanding problems between the two countries, is due to the sudden illness of the chairman of the German delegation.

Freedom Of Press At Stake, Says AP

Brief Filed With Supreme Court Calls The Labor Board Ruling A Blow To Basic Rights

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—Freedom of the press is directly violated by the Wagner Labor Relations Law, The Associated Press told the Spreme Court today as the way was paved for arguments against the act. As applied to The Associated Press, the law "actually destroys the independence of the press of this country," asserted John W. Davis of counsel for the press association in a brief filed today.

According to present plans, this case, with four other attacks upon the Wagner act, will be heard by the Supreme Court during the week of Feb. 8.

Whether it is engaged in interstate commerce or not, The Associated Press says, its New York editorial employes are not so engaged, and its relations with these employes do not directly affect such commerce and are not subject to Federal control.

The act is regulation not only of the activities or relations of persons engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, "but is essentially a bold attempt by Congress to impose 'collective bargaining' on all industry," Mr. Davis said.

New York Employe Discharged

The case came before the courts after The Associated Press discharged Morris Watson, an editorial employe in its New York office. He testified that he was told he was released "because we are dissatisfied with your work, you are dissatisfied with us, and I am convinced that you will be happier elsewhere." Kent Cooper, general manager of The Associated Press, authorized the dismissal of Mr. Watson, "solely on grounds," said Mr. Davis, "of his work not being on a basis for which he has shown capability."

The American Newspaper Guild filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board alleging unfair practices, but the press association said its action was not based on Mr. Watson's connection with the Guild. The Labor Board ordered The Associated Press not to discriminate against the Guild and to reinstate Mr. Watson with back pay. The Second Circuit Court upheld the board.

Mr. Davis, in today's brief, noted that after Mr. Watson was discharged the Labor Board heard him and concluded "that those whose duty it was to criticize his work were disingenuous about it," and that "union activities" really provoked the discharge. The brief stated that Mr. Watson had been openly engaged in Guild activities "without disturbance for over two years."

"In what possible connotation of the term can this be called a regulation of commerce between the States?" the Davis brief asked. "From what hidden source can the Federal Government derive the power to compel a private employer to retain an employe in his local office whose services he no longer desires?

Power to Choose Men Held at Stake

"Can freedom and independence of the press be maintained if a Federal bureau may dictate to the American newspapers the persons they employ to prepare their news reports? How can impartiality and independence of reporting be maintained under such a system of administrative supervision? How can accuracy, independence and impartiality survive a deliberate attempt by the government to impose upon The Associated Press a requirement that its news editors be union men?"

Mr. Davis said that whenever a union editorial employe of The Associated Press was discharged a case was at once made for the Labor Board by the claim, "whether rightly or not," that membership in a labor organization has been discouraged or the employe discriminated against. "The management of editorial personnel then becomes a question for the board to determine; the management of the editorial affairs of this great news service, in the gathering and preparation of news, is displaced by the Labor Board which Congress has created."

The Congressional history of the Wagner act leaves no doubt that collective bargaining was intended for all industry, whether local or not, Mr. Davis argued.

"It must be clear," he added, "that if Congress can pass a law to compel collective bargaining and forbid the discharge of employes, it can, when it chooses, go on to laws compelling in express terms the closed shop, the open shop, maximum and minimum wages, hours of employment, safety devices, sanitary arrangements, housing, the times and manner of payment—everything, in short, which by any possibility could be thought to promote the contentment of the laborer in any and every industry and thus lead to industrial peace."

First Amendment Held Violated

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—Counsel for The Associated Press asserted in its brief filed in the Supreme Court today that the National Labor Relations Act establishes supervision by a government board of the selection of news writers, therein violating the First Amendment to the Constitution. That amendment guarantees to citizens freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

The brief contended that, should the act be declared constitutional, The Associated Press could not freely or impartially perform the functions delegated to it by its 1,300 members. It also contended that regulatory control would be an established fact if the court granted the petition of the Labor Board that The Associated Press be required to reemploy Morris Watson.

The brief declared that authority claimed by the board under the act was non-existent, not only because it violated the First Amendment, but because it was an unrestricted attempt to regulate the relation between all industrial employers and employes by imposing "collective bargaining" upon them in violation of the Tenth Amendment; because the terms of the act were arbitrary, unreasonable and capricious, in violation of the Fifth Amendment; and because it denied the right to trial by jury, in violation of the Seventh Amendment.

It was contended, moreover, that the relation between The Associated Press and its editorial employes is not interstate commerce, does not directly affect such commerce and is not subject to Federal regulation.

Broad Principles Involved

The brief said in part:

"Impartiality and freedom from any bias is the fundamental aim of The Associated Press, and, largely through its efforts, this also is the aim of the American press at large. Freedom of the press and freedom of speech means more than freedom from censorship by government; it means that freedom of expression must be jealously protected from any form of governmental control or influence.

Among those who were present at the luncheon, were Mr. and Madame Albert Kammerer, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Knobel, Councillor to the French Embassy; Mr. Arnaud d'Andurain de Maytie, Secretary of the Embassy; Dr. and Madame Leon Mazaud, Director of the Maison Franco-Japonaise de Tokio; Baron Reijiro Wakatsuki, former Premier and President of the Maison Franco-Japonaise de Tokio; Viscount Sukekuni Soga, M.P. and President of the Franco-Japanese Society; Dr. Saburo Yamada, Dr. Naojiro Sugiyama, Mr. Jirochachi Satsuma, Mr. Kennosuke Horinouchi, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs and Mrs. Horinouchi, Mr. Shigeru Kuriyama, Director of the Treaty Bureau of the Foreign Affairs and Mrs. Kuriyama, and several other officials of the ministry.

A farewell tea party will be given in honor of the French Ambassador and Madame Kammerer at the Maison Franco-Japonaise de Tokio at 5 p.m. today. The Ambassador and his family will leave Tokyo for France at 3 p.m. Sunday from Tokyo Station by the Fuji Express.

MR. TAKASHI IBA PASSES

Mr. Takashi Iba, noted musical critic, who has been confined at the Den Infectious Diseases Research Institute Hospital since last week died there Thursday at the age of 50. He was a pioneer of opera music in Japan, the director of the Nippon Music Association and lecturer at the Art Department of the Nippon University.

WHITE CROSS SOCIETY

At a meeting held on February 24 at the Headquarters of the White Cross Society, Ogawa-machi, Kanda a Committee of 21 was set up to work with the parent society. This Committee is representative of the business, professional and missionary communities. It will assist the White Cross in its drive for funds, its educational work among all classes of Japanese, its preventorium for incipient cases and in all its efforts to stamp out tuberculosis which is so very prevalent in this country.

An executive committee was organized and various subcommittees were appointed. The Executive Committee is composed of Dr. Gilbert Bowles, Miss Helen Shipps, of St. Luke's Hospital, and Messrs. P. S. Mayer, E. C. Hennigar, F. R. Millard, R. D. McCoy and G. E. Bott. It is hoped that the foreign community throughout Japan will rally to assist this new drive on tuberculosis.

PAN-PACIFIC CLUB MEETING

The regular weekly meeting of the Pan-Pacific Club of Tokyo will be held at the Imperial Hotel at 12:15 p.m. Friday. The guests of honor of the day will be Mr. Arthur Jorgensen, Honorary General Secretary of the Y.M.C.A., who has just returned from India and Mr. Soichi Saito, National General Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. who has also just returned from India. Mr. Saito will speak on India and Japan.

USSR Gold Output In 1936 Is $30,000,000

strengthen or weaken its currency by lowering or raising prices. The foreign trade monopoly enables the state to prohibit the import of foreign goods, or to fix its own prices for imported goods without regard to the world market.

Comparison of prices inside and outside Russia indicates that the ruble's internal purchasing value remained fairly constant during 1936, at about 20 rubles to the dollar. In other words, 20 rubles in Russia will buy approximately the same goods as a dollar elsewhere.

While the ruble is not quoted on foreign exchanges, it is traded in border countries at about this rate. The official exchange rate of 5.06 rubles to the dollar has no relation to internal prices. It merely governs the incidental expenses of tourists and visitors, who must exchange their foreign currency at this rate. Tourists buy in advance abroad with foreign currency their transportation, hotels and meals, so that no exchange is involved except for small incidental expenses.

In earlier years, the Communists were indifferent to gold production, which they regarded as unimportant in their plans of "production for use." In 1927, production was less than half that of 1913. By 1930, however, the authorities had become interested in producing as much gold as possible, to finance purchases abroad for heavy industry and armaments, and in three years spent about $400 millions in prospecting and mechanizing the industry. New deposits were discovered, especially in Kazakstan, which, according to Soviet geologists, proved Soviet resources to be first in the world.

Output Increased

By 1933, production had reached approximately 2,700,000 fine ounces. Rapid progress has been made since, as the Government has spent vast sums upon prospecting and upon mechanizing the industry. Several modern refineries have been built, and Soviet factories now turn out a large part of the necessary equipment for placer mines and smelters.

The question remains: What does Moscow intend to do with its gold?

Reich Papers Conforming To National Socialism

the new Germany which will, must and can help itself from its own strength.

"The present time needs fighters, cooperators, not stay-at-homes: we want to help all those who are interested in being shown the way. This we conceive to be the task of the Berliner Tageblatt, as it is or should be of all German newspapers."

Organizers at the Helm

This article may be regarded as the program which the Tageblatt will carry out to the letter under its new editor's control. Herr Scheffer, his predecessor, was outstanding as a writer. His wide experience as a foreign correspondent in Soviet Russia, the United States, and England and his brilliant gifts had won for him a reputation beyond the German frontiers.

The writer now makes way for the organizer, for his successor has established his reputation rather as an organizer. He did much to build up the Berliner Nachtausgabe (afternoon edition) a few years ago and revealed his talent in the reorganization of the whole National Socialist party press throughout the Reich during the past two years.

It is understood that Herr Scheffer enjoys the fullest confidence of Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, who is the final arbiter in all press questions.

Other Changes Rumored

Regarding the Frankfurter Zeitung, report of changes in editorship have been current for some time past. The paper has been attacked on many occasions by the Schwarze Korps, the weekly organ of the Blackshirts (S. S.) and it is generally agreed that only strong pressure from certain influential circles has enabled it to continue under its present editorship.

What will happen in the future is still uncertain. The experiment with the Berliner Tageblatt may first be tested before anything is done with the Frankfurter Zeitung or the other remaining few "bourgeois" or moderate organs, like the Deutsche Allegemeine Zeitung.

Nothing "Between the Lines"

The time when it was possible to "read between the lines" in some of the principal newspapers is fast passing away. There is nothing there to read. The German press today contains either what the Government wants it to contain or nothing.

Whatever reorganization of the German press is brought about, it is doubtful whether the financial position of these newspapers will increase very much in the near future.

The World's Revolving Stage

that had kept the balls rolling in Spain.

It will probably end Comintern intervention on a large scale, thus reducing its expenses for the employment of agents. In fact the Non-Intervention Committee's arrangements may well be deemed a welcome solution by Moscow. A good chance to save its face. The Comintern revolution was doomed to failure from the first, for of all the Great Powers, the one which seemed most tolerant—Britain—was the Power which would never have tolerated it.

A Lesson to Learn

It is logical to suppose that the only other object of Comintern—or Moscow, for those who prefer it that way—was to make trouble. Why the Comintern wishes to make trouble anywhere—everywhere—is explained in all books, orders, and open messages dealing with its long-projected world revolution. It is so easy to let others fight among themselves and then step in behind the lines with a quick coup d'etat. At least it was easy in Russia.

So far it has not been easy anywhere else. The world is now about convinced that it cannot be repeated. Too many intelligent people know all the ins and outs of the hackneyed scheme. The sooner this truth is comprehended in Moscow, the sooner the world will be happy again.

Meanwhile Soviet Russia should be grateful to Britain for being able to retire gracefully from an embarrassing situation, and the rest of Europe for having been steered out of a trap. Especially Germany and Italy.

Apparently the answer depends upon whether or not the country is involved in a war. If the present war scare subsides, the gold may be used to stabilize the ruble on foreign exchanges.

Harvard Gets Plan For Carrer School

proceed slowly and cautiousiy, to avoid the pitfalls which beset a new educational experiment. Faculty and student body should be kept small during the early period.

The report says in part:

"The commission believes that there are sufficient opportunities in the public service to warrant the training of men by Harvard University for careers in it. Provisions should therefore be made for a new curriculum or for such adaptation of existing curricula as will provide this training in an effective way.

"Such a new curriculum or adaptation of existing ones can best be provided under the sponsorship of a separately organized graduate school of public administration.

"The objectives of this new school should be not only to provide an adequate program of training for public service but to promote research in public administration as well. Special emphasis should be laid upon this latter purpose, because there is need for scholarly and objective investigation into the problems of public administration and because it is now recognized that research is a vitalizing factor in all forms of training at the graduate level.

"It is research that helps to create the atmosphere of intellectual earnestness which the new school must have if the training given by it is to be commensurate in standards with that of the other graduate schools and departments at Harvard.

Independent Organization Urged

"The new school should be organized with a dean, a separate faculty, its own curriculum and degree, as well as its own separate budget.

"At the beginning the instructional staff of the graduate school of public administration need not include more than three or four instructors whose association is primarily with the new institution.

"The members of the faculty should command the respect of both academic and public groups by reason of their scholarly attainments or promise, their capacity for high-grade research, their broad interests, and their familiar contacts with governmental problems and officials.

"Together with these three or four persons, the faculty of the school should also include men selected from other faculties of the university, making a group of not more than twelve or fifteen at the outset.

"This limitation is desirable in order that the faculty shall be small enough to permit frequent, frank and informal discussions of the many problems of educational policy which will confront the school in its formative years.

"It is extremely desirable that the new school be inaugurated with a small enrollment in order that it may secure for itself a highly selected group of students, facilitate the placement of its graduates and afford opportunity for gathering new instructional data as well as for developing such methods of instruction and research as may be found most appropriate to this new educational enterprise.

"Accordingly the commission expresses the earnest hope that at the outset the enrollment will not include more than ten to fifteen in Category 1A (as described in the following sections), ten to twenty in Category 1B (depending upon whether additional funds can be obtained for assisting students in this group), and in Category 2 not more than are in Categories 1A and 1B combined.

Three Classifications Set Up

"The three classes of students who may be expected to take courses in the new school are as follows:

"1A. A limited number of carefully selected recent college graduates who may or may not have had some professional or graduate training.

"1B. A small group of men already in the public service who are college graduates and who would gladly seek leave of absence for the purpose of spending at least a year in the new school. It is obvious, however, that most of the men in this category will require financial aid in the form of liberal fellowships.

"The commission regards provision for this class of in-service students as of the highest importance not only to the improvement of the public service, but to the creation of a professional spirit in the school during its early years.

"Such mature students on leave of absence from their posts in the national, State, or municipal service would provide the school with a nucleus which would facilitate the setting of high standards from the very outset.

Anglo-US Treaty On Trade Nearer

sail for home on Wednesday, but now plans to leave from New York Thursday on the Aquitania. This will permit him to remain here until Wednesday afternoon. He will confer again with Secretary Hull before leaving

Mr. and Mrs. Runciman concluded their White House visit this noon, returning to the British Embassy where the president of the Board of Trade received the press. He returned to the White House for lunch. Secretary Morgenthau and other officials were present, but the conversation was described as only social.

The British official was accompanied to the State Department for his conference with Secretary Hull late in the day by Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British Ambassador. Assistant Secretary Sayre joined the conferees later.

Mr. Runciman, in replying to correspondents' questions at his press conference, spoke with definiteness only on trade matters. Inquiries concerning armament manufacturing programs, neutrality and the problem of raw materials, he either brushed aside or met by pointing to well known positions of his government.

He endorsed the views of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull that political peace must be based on economic peace, while adding that every nation had its own problems to confront. From the conversations he has held, he said, the policies of the United States and Great Britain appear similar.

Possibly with the Ottawa agreements in mind, Mr. Runciman said that Great Britain greatly desired an increase in trade, but not one that "interfered with our trade." Yet Britain's policy, he declared, is one of opening her gates wide to commerce.

Asked whether the Ottawa agreements were to be renewed, he replied in the affirmative, explaining that they would be modified to take advantage of experience but that there would be no great changes in policy.

The impression was gained that such questions as the Ottawa agreements, American neutrality policy and munitions manufacturing were not proving insurmountable obstacles to the consideration of a trade agreement.

Roosevelt Asks For Panama Canal Toll Cut

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26—Reduction of shipping tolls charged on vessels passing through the Panama Canal was sought by President Roosevelt in a message to Congress today.

In the message he suggested an amendment of the existing law providing, first that tolls shall be based on vessel tonnage to be determined by the Canal authorities' rules of measurement prescribed by the President, and second that tolls on commercial vessels, army and navy transports, colliers, supply and hospital ships shall be fixed at the maximum of $1 and the minimum of 75 cents per net ton of the canal rates.

California Freeze Piles Up Huge Loss

Half Of Citrus Crop, Worth $112,000,000 Last Year, Believed Ruined In 16° Cold

N. Y. Times

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 22.—Winter struck the half-billion dollar California citrus fruit industry its hardest blow in twenty-four years today.

Damage from the worst freeze since 1913 may total at least 50 per cent of the current crop of oranges, lemons and grapefruit. The crop last year was valued at $112,000,000. Temperatures in the heart of the 250,000-acre citrus empire dropped as low as 16 degrees—16 degrees below freezing—early today.

Government weather men at Pomona predicted that "conditions tonight will be decidedly better," and "may make very little orchard heating necessary in Southern California, except in the Imperial Valley."

Meanwhile the bitterest far-western cold wave in decades held tight in several States, while a coastal storm brought some relief to the Pacific Coast. Snow drifts isolated at least two groups of persons.

Two men and a boy lost their lives from burns in a desperate fight waged last night throughout the California citrus belt with oilfueled orchard heaters to save the trees, if not the fruit.

Pall Blankets a Wide Area

The smoke from an estimated 1,000,000 barrels of oil rolled up until long after daylight today, and formed a pall over much of Southern California. Near-twilight conditions prevailed in Los Angeles until mid-afternoon. Artificial lighting was required in the orchard areas, where visibility was about one city block.

The 16-degree temperature in the center of the citrus zone was 2 degress under the 1922 low when half the citrus crop was destroyed. Practically the entire crop was lost in the 1913 freeze, in which minimum temperatures were not recorded.

In Imperial Valley, the rich citrus and vegetable area near the Mexican border, today's temperatures sagged to 15 degrees, and even to 12 degrees in some sections, and it was feared that most of the valley's crop was ruined.

The California Fruit Growers Exchange said that a week might be required to estimate the damage. An early January freeze caused damage unofficially computed at $15 000,000.

Apparently, the only hope that today's damage would be under the 1922 percentage rested in improved orchard heating. In some areas last night heaters raised grove temperatures by 12 degrees.

D. W. Tubbs, Agricultural Commissioner of Orange County, said that every carload of fruit from there must be checked and that even fruit from heated orchards would be considered questionable.

The $500,000,000 valuation of the citrus industry is based largely on an average $2,000-an-acre value for full-producing acreage, including a valuation of about $1,300 an acre for the trees.

Bitter Weather in Many States

Nevada, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon and Montana felt the cold wave.

Eighteen sheepmen were snowbound with their flocks fifty-five miles south of Winnemucca, Nev. A rescue party was eighteen miles away.

Highway crews plowed through heavy drifts in North Central Utah toward the Clover Creek CCC camp, where 75 of the 140 men were ill with influenza. Skiers shuffled over Central Oregon seeking Jack Cress, a 26-year-old trapper, missing since early in the month.

Temperatures in the West ranged down to 52 degrees below zero at Swan Valley, Idaho.

In Los Angeles itself the official minimum temperature during the night was 34 degrees, but Colonel L. H. Daingerfield said that the warm air drifting from the heated orchards probably prevented the breaking of the all-time low temperature here. This record was 28 degrees, set both in 1885 and 1913.

Unofficial front-porch thermometers, however, dipped as low as 20 degrees in the city, and icicles formed under ice-box drains.

Citrus men said that the orchard heating was the longest and most intense the world has ever seen. The pall of smoke over Los Angeles was the thickest seen here in a generation. In the harbor fog horns were kept blowing all night.

In San Bernardino the temperature dipped to 17 degrees at 7:45 a.m. today, the lowest mark on record since the Weather Bureau was established in 1870. The previous low there was 18 degrees in the 1913 freeze.

The 15-degree minimum in the Imperial Valley was the coldest ever recorded there, the previous having been 17 degrees.

Growers feared that much of the early vegetable crop, which is sent to all parts of the nation, had been wiped out.

Percy Houts, a laboratory chemist and orchardist at Anaheim, said that oranges were frozen solid in some cases.

"I can't be optimistic any more," he declared. "All I can see now is the possibility of something from salvage," referring to citrus by-products extracted from unmarketable fruit.

The Puritan

A native of the Wild and Woolly West had ridden into town to do some shopping.

As the assistant wrapped up the annual pair of he-man's ranch socks, he asked:

"Anything else to-day? What about some pyjamas?"

"Young feller," replied the he-man, "I ain't no social rounder. When night comes I goes to bed."

Gertrude Ederle Sues Over Injury

First Girl To Swim The English Channel Says She Is A Semi-Invalid Due To Fall

N. Y. Times

MINEOLA, L. I., Jan. 27.—Gertrude Ederle, who set the world talking a decade ago when she swam the English Channel, the first woman to accomplish the feat, but who is now a semi-invalid, is suing the owners of a Hempstead apartment house for $50,000 on the ground a fall suffered there three years ago is responsible for her disability.

The 30-year-old former athlete shares an apartment at 70 Edgemere Avenue, Hempstead, with Miss Consuelo Saleva, an instructor in the Hempstead High School. On the wall is a framed sheet reading:

"This is to certify that Miss Gertrude Caroline Ederle swam the English Channel from France to England on the Sixth of August, 1926, in fourteen hours and thirty minutes."

The suit is against the Justine Apartments, Inc., of 330 Washington Avenue. The jury was impaneled today and it is expected the taking of testimony will begin tomorrow. Leaning heavily on a cane as she entered the courtroom, the Miss Ederle of 1937 was a contrast to the one who received such acclaim following her battle against the icy water of the Channel in 1926.

Miss Ederle's suit charges that on Dec. 12 1923, while living at the Justine Apartments, she slipped as a piece of loose tile moved on the second-floor stairway and she fell down the remaining fifteen steps, suffering injuries that prevented her from continuing her work as a counselor for a number of swimming clubs.

Her attorneys, Albert W. Meldon of Manhattan and Charles R. Weeks of Mineola, will introduce medical testimony in an effort to show that she suffered a permanent pelvic injury and now is compelled to sleep on a boardlike mattress, wear special appliances and walk with a cane. The complaint says she is able to operate an automobile only with the aid of a brace.

B. L. Pettigrew of Manhattan, attorney for the corporation, said the defense would deny that Miss Ederle fell in the apartment house and, further, that the injuries she described were caused by an accident.

In addition to the corporation, several individual directors are named as defendants in the suit.

Last August Miss Ederle was honored at a special A. A. U. swimming meet at Manhattan Beach held to commemorate the anniversary of her Channel conquest. She received a bronze plaque and a brooch. After the ceremony she gave a brief demonstration in the pool there of some of the strokes she used in her memorable swim.

more strict literary criteria for articles accepted under scrutiny of a larger board.

Founded by William M. Evarts, who became Secretary of State, the "Lit" celebrated its centennial a year ago. It retains its original cover design.

The business manager, Herbert M. Salzman of New York City, has conducted a successful drive for student circulation.

Broader Field for Record

The Yale Record opened the year with gentle satire on university customs which The Record's "Owl" thought had outlived their usefulness.

In this respect, The Record to some extent essayed the role of the "Harkness Hoot," which died after two years of caustic criticism of university customs.

In the past year The Record has developed along the lines of The New Yorker. It has departed from comment solely on collegiate life and includes reviews on the stage, art and books and discussions of political affairs.

Link With Alumni in Science

John Cornwall Ramsay of Hartford, Conn., is chief editor of The Yale Scientific Monthly, which, ten years ago, succeeded The Yale Scientific Magazine. Founded in 1895, the latter publication lapsed during the World War.

In the past year, The Scientific Monthly started a policy of linking undergraduate activities with alumni thought and interest in scientific developments. Under the present board the subjects have ranged from canned beer to television.

Recently, the magazine stimulated interest in the reading of such publications by offering a cup for the most meritorious one. The cup went to the publication of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which won it three times in succession.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Grab 'Em Girls!

According to a bachelor judge, our splendid British gals don't know how to make love.

So as one ideally experienced in the artifices of falling in love, and equally experienced in the cunning subtlety of falling out of it without expense, I am opening a "Grab and Snatch" Bureau for the special benefit of the sweet, innocent things.

Don't be amateurish, girls. Write to me and I'll show you how to obtain your heart's desire.

All you need do is to post me a copy of your technique, plus two guineas for a free demonstration. State whether blonde or brunette. If piebald, stay at home to help mother.

Marie Prevost Found Dead In Her Apartment

tions and reconciliations they were divorced in 1929.

Born in Canada

Miss Prevost was born in Sarnia, Canada. Her family moved to Los Angeles when she was a child and she attended St. Mary's School there and the Glenn Taylor School in Alameda, Calif. Still in her 'teens, she was visiting the Sennett lot in Hollywood one day when Ford Sterling, directing one of the slap-stick comedies, asked her if she would like to appear in a scene. She accepted the invitation and soon after became a regular player in the Sennett comedies.

About 1920, then a mainstay of the Sennett productions, she received a chance to enter feature pictures. Her transition was accompanied by considerable publicity. Miss Prevost wrote letters to editors, telling them how she was tired of being visualized only in bathing suits, and, to dramatize her change of fortune, she came to New York, went to Coney Island and tossed into the sea all her bathing girl pictures, her bathing girl suit and several thousand feet of bathing girl film.

Her first feature picture was the "Old Swimmin' Hole," in which she played opposite Charles Ray. Then came her association with Lubitsch, who, she once said, described her as "the champagne" of his cast. Among her early feature productions was "The Dark Swan," in which she played the spoiled beauty in competition with a plainer woman—the "dark swan"—for the love of a man.

Comedienne Parts

Her comedienne parts, under the Metropolitan banner, included "Up in Mabel's Room," "Almost a Lady," "For Wives Only," "Man Bait," "Getting Gertie's Garter" and "The Night Bridge." She was starred by Pathe-DeMille in "Girl in the Pullman," "The Rush Hour," "On to Reno" and "Blonde for a Night."

She also was featured in DeMille's "The Godless Girl," Paramount's "The Racket" and in "The Exodus of the New World," a Pioneer Film production. Other pictures in which she appeared were "The Sideshow," "Divorce Made Easy," "The Flying Fool," "Ladies of Leisure" and "Party Girl." In 1933 she appeared in "Parole Girl." She also was in "Only Yesterday."

Contrary to the jokes about bathing beauties, Miss Prevost was an expert swimmer. In 1921, while with the Universal Film Company, she saved King Baggott, a director from drowning after he had accidentally fallen into a swimming pool during the filming of a production. The true-to-life rescue so startled the camera man that he forgot to keep turning his crank.

In 1925 Miss Prevost, with Mr. Harlan, Louise Fazenda and Walter Long, suffered minor injuries in a wreck on the Sante Fe Railroad near Hollywood. Miss Prevost's mother, Mrs. H. Prevost, was killed in an automobile accident in New Mexico in 1926.

Facsimile Transmission Is Latest Invention

ly into place.

The first such telegraphic transmission device was put in operation between Buffalo and New York in November, 1935; a second experimental line to Chicago was extended to commercial use, with The Literary Digest purchasing the first service.

Applications

Telegraph facsimiles are much like the radio and telephone-wire transmission used for newspictures. The Associated Press Wirephoto, Photophone, Radiophoto and other systems, as well as television, utilize the same scanning principle, with the photo-electric cell turning light into electricity and the receiver turning it back into light again.

Radioed weather-maps to ships at sea have been introduced, and the Radio Corporation of America has been utilizing a wireless facsimile system between New York and Philadelphia. The future of facsimile transmission, easier to predict from an engineering standpoint than from a user-demand angle, is not expected to mushroom over the United States within a few months. Although ordinary telegrams are frequently sent by fax, Western Union officials foresee no technological unemployment. Its 40,000 employes, many of whom operate high-speed automatic telegraph-machines, are not alarmed at present.

One possibility in radioed facsimiles had been envisioned by newspaper publishers and broadcasting companies: Home receiving sets may print fax newspapers, a small page at a time, while the news subscriber sleeps. The cost would not be high if the demand were great enough.

Willcox's Name Heads List Of US Directorships

Listed With 109 Corporations, Poor's Publishing Co.'s Register Reveals

Literary Digest

If John Taney Willcox attened all the annual meetings of companies in which he is a Director, he would seat himself before a different directors' table almost every other day. If Mr. Willcox collected the traditional $20 fee each time he filled a plush chair, he would realize a neat $2,180 yearly side income. For Mr. Willcox, who is fifty, and peers at fellow employes of the Pennsylvania Railroad through shell-rimmed glasses, is America's No. 1 holder of Directorships.

Recently, Poor's Publishing Co. issued its 1937 Register of Directors. After Mr. Willcox's name were listed Directorships in 109 corporations.

Mr. Willcox earns his living as secretary and transfer agent of the $2,000,000,000 Pennsylvania Railroad, is a descendant of a family which made its fortune by manufacturing paper for government currency. Director Willcox began his career as law clerk for former U. S. Senator George Wharton Pepper of Pennsylvania; now, in his spare time, interests himself in corrective schools for children, plays mediocre golf.

If Mr. Willcox became America's busiest Director, as well its No. 1 Director, he would sit in on discussions concerning the warehouse business, sewage disposal, real estate, coal, train, ferry and boat transportation, and banking problems, mostly in subsidiary companies of the "Pennsy." But America's No. 1 Director seldom attends a directors' meeting. A competent secretary and staff save him the trouble.

No. 2 Director is Frederick Ely Williamson, President of the New York Central Railroad Company and President and Director as well of fifty-five other corporations, Vice-President and Director of eight, and a Director of thirty others, a grand total of ninety-four. Most of these companies are N. Y. C. subsidiaries.

No. 3 Director is Leo Spitz, whose ninety-one Directorships are mostly in subsidiary theater corporations of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, of which Mr. Spitz is President.

Big Names

Such redoubtable names as du Pont, Mellon, Rockefeller, Morgan have relatively few Directorship listed after them. Though they have the largest family representation, the ten du Ponts muster only thirty seats in all. Brothers Pierre S., Lammot and Irenee, sit on the General Motors Board of Directors along with their first cousin Henry F. du Pont.

The Rockefellers, John D., Jr., and sons John D., 3d, and Nelson, share nineteen Directors' seats, most of them in philanthropic enterprises.

J. Pierpont Morgan, head of the House of Morgan, is a Director in the Aetna Insurance Company, the Metropolitan Opera and Real Estate Company, the Pullman Company, the United States Steel Corporation and seven other corporations.

Mellon

Conspicuous by its absence is the name of Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury under Presidents Hoover and Coolidge. His nephew, Richard King Mellon, carries the family name into the meeting-rooms of nineteen Boards of Directors, including the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Aluminum Corporation of America, Pan American Airways, and the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company.

Subscribers for the Register of Directors cannot buy the huge volume. The seventy-seven-year-old Poor's Publishing Company only leases the service for $60 a year, sets up stringent rules which must be followed on penalty of forfeiture of the service (one of them—the volume must not be lent). From its huge files Poor's draws up mailing-lists to individuals and corporations, sends out 300,000 questionnaires yearly. If the questionnaire is not answered, Poor's omits the person or institution questioned, regardless of his or its importance.

This year's edition is the tenth, shows 25,000 changes from the 1935 volume, weighs eleven pounds.

Yale Wins Swim From Dartmouth

N. Y. Times

HANOVER, N. H., Jan. 30—Yale University's swimming team defeated Dartmouth in the Spaulding Pool today, capturing eight of nine first places to win by the score of 57 to 18. It was the 155th consecutive dual meet victory for the Ellis and their second Eastern Intercollegiate Swimming League triumph of the season.

New records were marked up in two events as the New Haven 300-yard medley relay team clipped eight seconds from the pool mark, covering the distance in 3:08.4. Ed White, Dartmouth junior, captured the Indian's only first place as he took the 200-yard breast stroke in 2:31 to set a new college and pool record.

Besides their eight first places, the Elis garnered four seconds and four thirds.

Apart from the two record shattering races, the feature race proved to be the 400-yard relay. Captain Dick Cooke of Yale got off to a poor start on the anchor leg after Schrode of Dartmouth had caught Moonan on the third lap. Cooke was unable to close on Fletcher in the first 50 yards as he missed a turn, but came back in the final two lengths with a magnificent burst of speed which brought the gallery to its feet cheering as he nosed out the Dartmouth swimming.

The Summaries

300-Yard Medley Relay—Won by Yale (Mackey, Richards, Rogers); Dartmouth (Gilbert, Carroll, Goldman), second. Time—3:08.4 (new pool record).

220-Yard Free-Style—Won by Brueckel, Yale; Phillips, Yale, and Fletcher, Dartmouth, tied for second. Time—2:21.

50-Yard Free-Style—Won by Perryman, Yale; E. White, Dartmouth, second; Wilson, Yale, third. Time—0:25.

Fancy Dive—Won by Christener, Yale (91.23 points); Danforth, Yale, second; Carey, Dartmouth, third.

100-Yard Free-Style—Won by Cooke, Yale; Schrode, Dartmouth, second; Moonan, Yale, third. Time—0:54.8.

150-Yard Back-Stroke—Won by Mittendorf, Yale; Young, Dartmouth, second; Milbleck, Yale, third. Time—1:23.

200-Yard Breast Stroke—Won by E. White, Dartmouth; Martin, Yale, second; Anthony, Yale, third. Time—2:31 (new college and pool record).

400-Yard Free-Style—Won by Macionis, Yale; Spendelow, Yale, second; R. White and Graf, Dartmouth, tied for third. Time—5:04.4.

400-Yard Relay—Won by Yale (Wilcox, Good, Moonan, Cooke); Dartmouth (Fiske, Cushman, Schrode, Fletcher), second. Time—3:44.9.

Lecture On U.S. Given In London By Col. Roosevelt

Spanish-American War Is Subject Of Talk At University Of London

Times, London

LONDON, Feb. 5.—The third of his six Watson Chair Lectures on "The United States as a Colonial Power" was given by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt last night in the new buildings of the University of London. His subject was "The Spanish-American War."

Lord Crewe, who presided, pointed out that few people in this country knew much about the Spanish-American War. For the present generation there was a blind historical spot in their minds about the period not long before their birth.

Colonel Roosevelt said that in the latter years of the nineteenth century the accepted broad doctrine on colonies was that they were trade assets. They were considered in terms of customers for manufactured products and sources of raw materials. The figures on trade with colonies certainly proved that in many instances colonies had been a continuous loss and in others a very doubtful economic asset.

From 1894 to 1932 Italy's total trade with her colonies, imports and exports combined, was only 5,561,-100,000 lire. From 1913 to 1932 she spent on those colonies 6,856,000,000 lire. In this latter figure was not included a penny for such wars as might have been coincident to acquiring these colonies. The expenses might be roughly termed operating costs. She spent 1,300,000,-000 more lire in keeping control durthe last 20 years of the period than she got in gross trade during 40 years.

The German record was much the same. In the 10 years from 1903 to 1913 her trade was 770,000,000m., but her expenses were 844,000,000m. They story was much the same for France and Japan. The record of Great Britain had been much better, but that was largely due to trade with the Dominions. The colonies, strictly speaking, probably showed a loss.

While this economic aspect was developing, still another school of thought was beginning to make itself felt. The growing force of democracy and humanitarianism was beginning to change the attitude of some of the colonial Powers. Though the idea of self-determination had not been born, altruism took the form of a firm belief that the best thing a white country could do for a colored country was to take it over, and for the superior whites to administer the affairs of the inferior indigenes. Colonies, besides all this, were a badge of importance as far as a nation was concerned. They were like the letters after a man's name in Who's Who. They gave to the country owning them a standing among the nations and were a guarantee that the nation had come of age.

Cuba, which was the last sizable Spanish possession in the Americas, had seethed with revolt for many years. This culminated in 1895 when revolution flamed from one end of the island to the other. Traditionally, America had always been on the side of all those who struggled for independence. Her sympathy with the Cubans was manifest everywhere. Very naturally tension grew between America and Spain. America was totally unprepared from any reasonable standpoint, but Spain was in worse plight. Not only were America's emotions touched by Cuba's struggle for independence, but in addition she was beginning to feel her strength; like a young bull buffalo, she wanted to test her prowess against some other member of the herd. She wished to take her place among the great nations of the earth.

Complex Problem

Nearly 40 years had passed since the Civil War, and their military and naval forces were at a low ebb. That did not deter America. Indeed, it never had. She was quite capable of cutting down her military establishment one year and blithly declaring war the next year. America, when the war finished, found herself victorious over a European foe, with no scars of battle and a comfortable feeling of heroism combined with altruism. Her ostensible reason for entering the war had been to gain indepedence for Cbua. She found herself, however, with a far more complex problem. She had in addition Puerto Rico and the Philippines.

The general attitude of mind of the white people at that period was that no nation with any pretence to importance should be without colonies. There was at that time a general empire complex which intected them at once. America decided that she, too, would be an empire and shoulder "the white man's burden." As far as Cuba was concerned she stood by her guns, but as long as she took the position embodied in the Monroe doctrine that interference from Europe could not be tolerated, she had to accept the corollary, which was that she herself was responsible to set right conditions of which European countries might justly complain. As a result she had been in and out of Cuba continually.

All of the countries concerned disliked her, and the term "Yankee" carried with it the force of an abusive epithet. She was generally represented as a cunning and cruel monster which was bleeding the people white. The almighty dollar was represented as her only motive. She was no more interested in the money aspect of these relations than were England and France—and no less. In these countries her nationals had on the whole lost about as much money as they had made. Some of her business men had behaved badly. Often they had combined stupidity and avarice, but the nation as a whole, acting through its Government, had been kindly and long-suffering, according to its lights.

Racial Characteristics

In the case of neither Puerto Rico nor the Philippine Islands had America announced her intention of liberating when she declared war. The problem, therefore, was just what status they should assume. The vast majority of America's people did not ever know they existed. Both were ceded by Spain, which automatically made them American possessions.

In any consideration of America's later-day colonial policy certain racial characteristics must be taken into consideration. Her association with other countries had been slight. The mass of her people knew only their neighbors and were accustomed to thinking only in terms of the life of the community that surrounded them. Like most countries—England for example—America was convinced that she had the best form of government ever devised in the world and that her customs and habits were also the most advisable.

The logical sequence was that American people felt they could do no higher or nobler work than to model other people on themselves. It was the same underlying spirit that had prompted missionaries from time immemorial to undergo hardships and dangers in order to persuade others to adopt their brand of Christianity. As America's people had had so little contact with the outside world they were persuaded not merely that it was a splendid altruistic action to pour others into the same mould; but they were also equally confident that all people were much the same.

Ohio Flood Loss Put At $70,000,000

Total Includes The Damage To Property And Business As Well As Relief Costs

N. Y. Times

COLOMBUS, Ohio, Jan. 30—While Ohio counted its flood cost upward from $70,000,000 tonight, a representative of President Roosevelt said that the Federal Government would seek to curb future inundations of the valley.

The $70,000,000 included property and highway damage estimated by veteran newspaper men who described the flood from Marietta downriver as the worst in the valley's history, losses suffered by business and workers, and costs for relief and rehabilitation.

Charles West, Under-Secretary of the Interior, here for discussions with flood control groups, said that a survey of data now available would be made to determine the best means of harnessing the Ohio and its tributaries.

Dr. Morgan May Join Study

He mentioned Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as one of the prominent engineers who might make the survey.

Public Works Administration funds are now available to finance the survey, Mr. West said, and it will be begun under the President's direction as soon as he obtains the views of groups in the seven States concerned.

Before Congress are measures by Senator Bulkley and Representative Secrest of Ohio to establish an Ohio Valley Authority to erect dams on the Ohio and its tributary streams.

Mr. West will address two conferences here next week on flood control. Chamber of Commerce representatives from all flood areas will attend one on Wednesday, and the second, on Friday and Saturday, will be attended by legislators of flood-ridden States.

Figures on Losses in State

Flood damage to property in Ohio was unofficially estimated, by districts, as follows:

Cincinnati	$15,000,000
Portsmouth	5,000,000
Ironton	2,000,000
Pomeroy	1,000,000
Marietta	1,500,000
Manchester, Ripley, New Boston and Other Villages Between Portsmouth and Cincinnati	1,500,000
East Liverpool	25,000
Steubenville	25,000
Martins Ferry	35,000
Gallipolis	15,000

John J. Jaster Jr., State Highway Director, estimated that $10,000,000 damage was caused to highways, bridges and municipal streets.

The cost of maintaining 2,500 National Guardsmen in flood areas already has mounted past $125,000, according to Adjt. Gen. Emil F. Marx.

Maurice Reddy, director of Red Cross activities in Ohio, reported that his organization had spent $500,-000 in the State and was spending $500,000 more daily and that this "does not take into account what is given free."

Loss from business and payrolls was roughly estimated at $30,000,-000 for the entire Ohio side of the valley. The estimate included Portsmouth's $16,000,000 bi-weekly industrial payroll. Some Cincinnati firms, forced to halt work, did not discontinue payrolls.

Cincinnati Clean-Up Begun

CINCINNATI, Jan. 30.—Cincinnati watched the water line retreat toward the Ohio River tonight and started cleaning up hundreds of business houses and residences.

The river fell 1.46 feet here in eighteen hours today. From a midnight gauge reading of 76.69 feet it had slipped to 75.23 at 6 p.m.

The city continued on a "Sunday basis," under orders from C. A. Dykstra, disaster dictator. Business houses, he said, would remain closed at least through Monday. Those in the lower end of Third Street are restocking merchandise. Salaries were paid as usual in most establishments.

Electricity in greater amounts flowed to sections where only the barest minimum had been available early in the week. One generator of the Cincinnati Gas and Electric Company was restored to service, but officials said that it would fall far short of supplying the normal volume of power.

Neither President H. C. Blackwell nor City Manager Dykstra would make a specific date for the return of water and electric service to its normal basis.

Many churches, even out of the flood zone, canceled Sunday services. Archbishop John T. McNicholas directed that an hour's exposition of the Blessed Sacrament be held in Catholic churches out of the flood area.

Pumping out flood waters may start tomorrow and the city water supply be returned to normal by Wednesday.

Cleaning streets and houses, even the follow-up task of repairing damage, started. Workers moved floating houses back to foundations from which they had been washed.

More than 9,000 flood refugees were examined by physicians. Persons mildly ill of communicable diseases were isolated.

Health Commissioner F. K. Harder warned that all perishable food touched by flood water must be destroyed.

H. H. Kranz, city highways engineer, foresaw a greatly improved drinking water situation over the week-end. By Sunday, he said, forty-three huge tanks from other cities would be installed at strategic locations to supply drinking water.

GRADUATION CEREMONY

The Graduation Ceremony of the Kwansai Gakuin University will be held at the central auditorium of the University, Nishinomiyashigai, Hyogo Prefecture at 10 p.m. Saturday, March 13. This year, the first graduates of the University, about 90 students of the Law and Literary Courses, and 120 students of the Commercial Course of the University are to go out from the University.

At the ceremony, diplomas and certificates will be presented to the students by the President, Dr. C. G. L. Bates of the University. After that presentation, the Governor and Mayor of the Hyogo Prefecture will make congratulatory addresses.

After the ceremony all the graduates will be served at celebration dinner.

SENDAI NOTES

The annual Literary Society program of the Aoba Jo Gakuin was held in the Parish House of Christ Church last Saturday evening. An interesting group of plays was presented to a large and appreciative audience.

Mrs. G. W. Schroer of Morioka spent the past weekend in Sendai as the guest of Miss Bernice Jansen.

Miss Camilla Fesperman, who was operated on for appendicitis two weeks ago, is home from the hospital and is making a satisfactory recovery.

The Rev. and Mrs. W. Draper entertained last Saturday evening in honor of the graduating students in their several English-speaking clubs. There were 25 present for a delightful buffet supper, followed by an evening of conversation and games.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop and Mrs. Binsted returned to Sendai last week. Mrs. Binsted will remain permanently in Sendai from now on but, until summer, the Bishop will continue to spend the greater part of his time in Tokyo.

A A traveling salesman, detained in a certain village ovtrnght, was the capacity of a general secretariat ntroduced in the town's hotel to a a crazy little billiard-table and a set of balls of a uniform, dirty-gray color.

"But how do you tell the red from the white?" he asked.

"Oh," replied the landlord, "you soon get to know them by their shape."

British To Stress Physical Training

ming baths.

The limitation now imposed under section 86 of the Education Act, 1921, under which local education authorities can provide (or aid the provision of) physical and social facilities for persons over 18 year of age only in so far as they are attending an educational institution, will be removed.

In Scotland the powers of local authorities will be extended so that effect may be given to the proposals of this scheme.

Twofold Task

The existing provision for physical training, the document explains, is at present insufficient in amount and sporadic in its incidence, and hampered as it is by lack of funds for development, cannot do more than touch the fringe of the problem. But the present proposals "will clearly fail of their purpose unless the fullest use is made of them by the existing agencies, whether voluntary bodies or local authorities. Their task will be a twofold one—first, to create in the public mind a relization of the value of physical fitness for its own sake, and, secondly, to provide facilities sufficiently attractive to make an effective appeal to the people of the country. The Government hope and believe that the attainment of these ends will be brought nearer by the measures proposed."

Since "action has already been taken in many ways" to solve the problem of nutrition "and the expansion of these efforts is engaging the attention of the Government," the White Paper is confined to physical training and recreation. Mention is made of the circulars on physical education issued by the Board of Education and the Scottish Education Department early in 1936, which were primarily directed to the need for securing suitable provision for physical training in the schools; and the White Paper continues:—

"While much still remains to be done to place the subject in a satisfactory position in the schools, there is general agreement as to the lines of advance. The machinery for the necessary expansion and development is ready to hand, and it will be the Government's concern to urge on those responsible the importance of seeing that it is utilized to the full.

"But however adequate may be the facilities provided in the schools, they will largely fail of their purpose unless they are supplemented by arrangements for those whose daily environment of the office or the workshop makes the provision of opportunities for physical improvement particularly desirable."

Central Coordination

A variety of agencies is in the field, including local authorities, acting both in their education capacity and otherwise, and a considerable number of voluntary bodies. In certain areas physical training classes and recreational facilities are also provided by the Ministry of Labor for the benefit of the unemployed. The powers of the local authorities for aiding physical training and recreation are described, and reference is made to the work of such voluntary bodies as the Ling Association of Teachers, the League of Health and Beauty, the English Folk Dance and Song Society, the Institute of Margaret Morris Movement, the National Association of Organizers of Physical Training, the national associations dealing with boys' clubs and girls' clubs, the Boys' and Church Lads' Brigades, the Scouts and Guides, the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A., the National Federation of Women's Institutes, the Welsh League of Youth, various other similar organizations, the Central Council of Recreative Physical Training, the National Playing Field Association, the Juvenile Organizations Committee, and the National Council of Social Service.

But the Government are convinced of the need of central coordination of effort. Moreover, the funds available from all sources are insufficient to cover the ground as fully as is needed.

A Wide Field

Discussing certain questions of policy, the memorandum rejects the compulsory solution as "wholly alien to the national temper and tradition." There is also the danger of enforcing a system involving precise definitions of the ages between which it is to be applied, of the extent of the obligation to be imposed, and of the nature of the training to be undergone. The aim of the Government is not to secure that between certain ages every boy and girl practises certain physical exercises or achieves a certain standard of physical development, but to inculcate a wider realization that physical fitness has a vital part to play in promoting a healthy mind and human happiness."

The Government have decided that any scheme must embrace the whole field of physical culture and should therefore include arrangements for increasing the supply not only of gymnasia but also of playing fields, swimming baths, and other means of healthy physical recreation. Also it has to be recognized that many may desire opportunities for physical exercise and recreation not solely as such but as part of a fuller club or community life, and the scheme will accordingly extend to combined provision of this character.

wheel chair, or a new brace or a new corset. In many cases good advice or a careful medical examination gives helpful results.

You will see, therefore, that the foundation has been putting the care of infantile paralysis and the research into its causes on a national basis for the first time. The expense of research and of the national coordination of these cases entirely absorbs the 20 per cent of the proceeds of these birthday parties.

You are giving tremendous help, not only to the crippled children of your own community but also to the fight against the continuance of infantile paralysis in the nation. The work, with your help, is going on. It will not cease until some day the disease itself is brought under control and proper aid has been rendered to all.

I wish that some physical way might be found for me to come in person to each of your parties tonight. I am with you in spirit. I am grateful to you for the splendid work that you are doing, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart.

French Loans Stir Opponents Of Devaluation

Christian Science Monitor

PARIS, Feb. 5—Strong opposition to further devaluation of the franc is developing constantly in Chamber of Deputies debates. This coupled with the Government's difficulty in floating adequate loans at home or abroad to care for its needs, makes the financial issue paramount in France today.

Good finances are as important as adequate military defenses in the strenuous times ahead, is the opinion of the French parliamentarians. The difficulty, however, is that there is still a demand for fulfilment of the costly social program of the Blum Administration, despite the present stringent conditions of the Treasury.

Forced borrowing abroad, notably in Britain, to meet current needs was strongly criticized by speakers in the financial debate resumed here today. The fear is being expressed lest French freedom may be alienated as these borrowings are based on gold and therefore earmark the holdings in the Bank of France.

Bonnet's Speech

In this connection, Georges Bonnet the French Ambassador to Washington, speaking at the American Club, affirmed that his mission was not to obtain financial aid for France but to bring France into the greater good will of the great democracies.

Precisely how much will be required by the Treasury is one subject of dispute. Various figures were quoted, but Vincent Auriol, French Minister of Finance, put the total deficit at 35,000,000,000 francs.

It is being argued that the remedy for the financial difficulties ahead does not necessarily lie in a change of Government, as urged by the extremists, but it is obvious, according to former Minister of Finance Paul Reynaud, of the Center Republican group, that some change in financial policy is essential and at an early date, as confidence is far from being restored. If their financial fears were allayed, said M. Reynaud, the French people would subscribe adequately, as their resources are enormous.

Prices Going Up

M. Reynaud insisted that deflation of public expenditures should have accompanied devaluation. But prices are booming, without sufficient advantage to the Treasury. He said that further devaluation would be a crime against the country.

But possible further devaluation is being freely canvassed. M. Auriol denies the intention to devaluate again, but there is a lower legal margin of nearly 7 per cent of which he may hereafter properly avail himself.

Single-Blade Plane Makes Appearance

Literary Digest

Quite casually, one day recently, a group of aviation engineers threw a dispatcher at Brooklyn's Floyd Bennett Airport into a wild state of alarm. The engineers were seeking permission, they explained, to go up into the observation-tower to watch for a flier who was coming in with only one blade on his propeller.

"Good Lord—he'll crack up sure!" shouted the excited dispatcher, and forthwith would have scurried about for ambulances and crash-wagons, had he not been forcibly restrained long enough to receive an explanation which was itself incredible to any sane airman: the incoming flier was not in trouble, was, in fact, the inventor of a freakish-looking single-bladed propeller which hopped up his plane's speed 25 per cent and stepped up his rate of climb by one-third.

Principle

Later, a trim Taylor Cub monoplane skimmed down on the runway, the motor died, and as the propeller became visible, astonished air-field attendants noted that half the "stick" was missing. One blade was set in a hub, but the balancing-blade, which should have extended beyond it, seemed to have been chopped off and its place taken by a stubby metal counterweight.

Out of the monoplane stepped a slender, intent young man with curly black hair. Gravely he explained the principle of the strange prop, recapitulating facts long known to aviation engineers. The leading blade of a conventional propeller cuts through undisturbed air, exerts maximum tractive power. The blade which follows causes "burble," a disturbed condition of the air which lowers efficiency. The serious young man, who introduced himself as W. W. Everts, of Baltimore, had gone straight to the heart of the problem by designing a single-blade propeller with a counterbalance. Result: complete elimination of vibration, absence of gyroscopic action, a 50 per cent reduction in take-off run.

Variable Pitch

Everts has been working on propeller-design for eight years. Six years ago, he patented a variable-pitch screw with spring action. Four years ago, he dropped that, brought out a variable-pitch prop with manual control, two years ago patented one which was automatic with constant speed. His odd one-sided air-screw was patented last May, put through exhaustive wind-tunnel and laboratory tests, proved practical in actual flight, and, last week, given its public demonstration to confound the aviation wiseacres. Many fliers, aware that a prop which has lost half of balance can tear a motor out of its mounting, regarded the single-blade prop as a visionary's dream until they saw it with their own eyes.

As yet, the Everts air-screw has been used only in small planes.

"The Good Earth" Is Good Picture

Mishkin writes in the New York Morning Telegraph, in its larger aspects "is not so much the tale of a Chinese farmer as it is of universal travail and suffering, of the joys and sorrows common to all mankind."

Two scenes in which Mr. Muni makes this universally clear are the one in which he, a naive peasant farmer, hears a radical orator for the first time and the scene in which he excitedly tells the wife O-Lan, of his scheme to enrich himself gradually by tiny, piecemeal buying of infinitesimal plots of land. She hears him with a stirring combination of patience and resignation and when he is finished she doesn't answer with words. She simply looks at him. Slowly Wang deflates, his enthusiasm running out at his heels. Shrugging, finally, he says: "Well . . . it seemed a good idea at first."

China Scenes

The scenes shot in China are enriching, and the picture arrives at one of its tremendously thumping moments when the camera, peering across a vast valley to a mountainside, records the exodus of thousands from the North and its bitter famine. Chinese stream down the mountainside in hunger-ridden armies, packed tight together in a common misery.

Hollywood has sought artfully and ardently to find a role for Mr. Muni for some years. On two occasions it almost fitted him with a part to his dimension, but not until now has he found the scope and strength his talents demand. There is no question but what his performance as Wang is one of the finest in the whole history of cinema.

Luise Rainer

He shares the altitude of this work with Miss Rainer, who must take rank with the outstanding actresses of all time. With little to say and that to be said quietly and almost stolidly, she, perforce, relies on pantomime through much of the picture. In the droop of one shoulder she expresses the woes of humanity. A lift of a suddenly happy face suffuses the scene with sunshine and joyousness. Her O-Lan is a conquest.

Together they are simple, tender, earthy and amazingly real.

Dozens of unidentified Chinese, in quick camera flashes, supply exceptional honesty to the major performances. Lotus, the dancing girl, is vividly, warmly realized by Tilly Losch.

Quieter, less explosive and penetrating, but none the less completely realized are performances by Walter Connolly as the ancient uncle; Charles Grapewin, as the Old Father, Keye Luke and Roland Lui, in the scenes where the sons are grown, play to Mr. Muni with force tempered by the traditional Chinese sense of filial duty and humility.

No audience will long resist the thrust of the scene of the riot and looting in which O-Lan is swept along by the maddened horde and, suddenly, finds herself alone in the great house, sore, trampled and bruised. Her eyes light on the neglected bag of jewels and she takes them. In that scene Miss Rainer passes through the best traditions of pantomime and creates a mark for other actresses to match if they can. It will be long, with Hollywood equipped as it is now, before one does surpass her.

SUCCESSFUL CONCERT GIVEN

A successful concert was given by the Sports and Social Club of the P. and O. s.s. Carthage at the Yokohama Seamen's Club recently at which there was an excellent attendance.

The program opened with a selection Follow the Fleet by the Cathage Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Paul Pitt which was followed by a duet for tenor and baritone, Watchman, what of the Night sung by A. T. Claxton and J. Harrower. The next item was a mirth-provoking sketch, the Two Tramps, by Jack Noble and Joseph Hawes following which Florence Tyte, soprano, sang An Old Violin and as an encore gave Love's Old Sweet Song.

Piano duets were then given by Alfred Whinney and William Hoare followed by Cherry Ripe a soprano Solo by Stella Payne. The first half of the program was concluded with a sketch, Just Another Day at Narkover.

After a short interval Jim Hardy sang the coon songs A Shanty in Old Shanty Town and Lilly of Laguna, with characteristic step-dances. A soprano and tenor duet The Keys of Heaven was then given by Florence Tyte and A. T. Claxton which was received with great applause. William Hoare followed with a saxaphone solo Valse Vanite and on being recalled gave Kojo-no Tsuki.

Two English Ballads, In an Old Fashioned Town and When You Come Home were given by Mabel Doyle, Contralto in great style.

The high spot of the evening was the sketch by Noel Coward, The Cats Cradle, in which Paul Pitt and Joseph Hawes gave a marvellous interpretation of two spinsters whose match-making activities on behalf of Minnie and Walter their respective cats were eventually forestalled by nature.

Following this James Harrower bass abritone sang At Dawning and Maire My Girl. The final item There's A Good Time Coming was given by the entire company. High praise is due to William Hoare, the Producer, on his achievement in presenting such a fine show, this being the initial effort of the newly organized "Carthage Concert Party." Mention must also be made of the many willing helpers at the Club, whose wholehearted cooperation brought the performance to such a satisfactory conclusion.

The Rev. Bernard Briggs, Missions to Seamen chaplain, ably compared the show, and Mr. Paul Pitt accompanied.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Vague Compliment

The man in the corner of the railway carriage pulled out a notebook and pencil and began to make a sketch of the man sitting opposite.

The "model," flattered by the attention paid him, leaned forward and said "I perceive, sir, that you are an artist."

"Well, no," replied the other. "Not exactly. I make designs for door-knockers."—Tit-Bits.

British War Hero Dies In Air Crash

N. Y. Times

LONDON, Feb. 4.—The wreckage of The Daily Express survey airplane Dragon Fly, which had been missing since it left Renfrew, Scotland, for Liverpool Tuesday morning, was found today by a shepherd on a hilltop near Newton Stewart, Wigtownshire, Scotland, its four occupants dead.

The victims were Major Harold Pemberton, D. S. O., one of the ablest and best known journalists in Britain; Leslie Jackson, pilot; T. H. Philpott, aviation radio expert, and R. C. Wesley, photographer.

Major Pemberton, the second son of Sir Max Pemberton and a godchild of the late Viscount Northcliffe, was 47 years old. He began his career as a junior reporter on The Daily Express, transferred to The Daily Mail under Northcliffe, remained there seventeen years, and in 1929 returned to The Express at what was believed to be the record salary for a Fleet Street reporter, £2,300.

Although he was a man of slight build, he possessed great courage. One of his feats during the World War was to capture a canal from the Germans after 180 allied troops had been wiped out at this strong point. He held the position by working a machine gun single-handed. The French awarded him the Croix de Guerre with palm. His life in Fleet Street was a crowded adventure. He knew and took all the risks.

Flying through the night, he was one of the first on the scene of the wreck of the British dirigible R-101. He was one of the first British reporters in Ethiopia and was with General Francisco Franco's army at the sacking of Badajoz. The scenes of carnage there, he said, had a greater effect on him than anything he experienced during the World War.

He reached Seville at the outbreak of the civil war by flying from Sardinia across the Mediterranean in a private airplane that carried just sufficient gasoline to reach the African coast with a favorable tail wind.

Major Pemberton had a seat on the editorial council of The Daily Express, but he held his job was reporting and tackled a local murder or an interview with Mussolini—who sent for him after the Ethiopian campaign—with equal enthusiasm.

Major Pemberton is survived by his wife, the daughter of the late Sir Philip Payne, and three children.

Mr. Wesley was the son of the famous Chief Inspector Wesley of Scotland Yard and Mr. Jackson was a pilot-sergeant in the Air Force before taking up commercial aviation. Both Mr. Wesley and Mr. Philpott were staff men of The Daily Express, which had assigned Major Pemberton to survey the inland air route recently suggested by the government's Civil Aviation Committee.

Major Pemberton had declared that the proposed route between Glasgow and Liverpool would be "suicidal" in Winter owing to ice-forming conditions over the Scottish and Westmoreland hills, and it was on a closer inspection of this route that he met his death.

Navy Chief Warns Of Britain's Might

By FERDINAND KUHN Jr.

N.Y. Times

LONDON, Feb. 5.—A sharp warning to other nations not to underrate Britain's naval rearmament was delivered tonight by Sir Samuel Hoare, First Lord of the Admiralty, in a speech to the Bradford Chamber of Commerce.

Although the speed of the British building program had been common knowledge here for several months, Sir Samuel spoke tonight as if the truth had not penetrated into certain official minds abroad. At any rate, he had never before been so belligerent in emphasizing the armed might of Britain at sea and in reminding unnamed foreign powers that they would challenge it at their peril.

He expressed relief that completion of the Singapore naval base was "well within sight." It will be the most up-to-date naval base on earth, he declared, and will insure that mobility of British sea power in the East which is so vital to Australia, New Zealand and India.

"We are virtually building a new fleet," he went on, "although the cost of ships has doubled or trebled since the days before the war. We intend to complete our task.

Superiority Is Claimed

"Let there be no doubt in the minds of foreign countries as to the progress of our program. We can still build ships better and quicker than any other country in the world, and these ships will once again confirm the influence of British sea power.

"Our inherited skill is showing itself in our new construction; our traditional determination is carrying through a great program punctually and efficiently."

It is an "utter fallacy and delusion," he declared, to imagine that air power has superseded sea power and made navies obsolete. From the viewpoint of British Empire defense, he said, air power is making sea power all the more effective.

Then asserting that "the world is in a greater state of confusion than at any time since the break-up of the Roman Empire," Sir Samuel added:

Stength Essential

"Never was it so essential for the British Empire to be strong and for the empire to know how best to use its strength. The empire is the greatest area of internal peace the world has ever seen. Within its borders is the broadest freedom for races and nationalities to develop on their distinctive lines that ever has been known in history. Justice, law, order, tolerance and goodnature have never found so wide a kingdom. If all this were lost to the world how great would be the calamity to the human race.

"It is because we will not contemplate this calamity that we are determined to be strong. Once again we will make our sea power the greatest force for peace in the world. We will make our air force an effective instrument for mobile defense throughout the empire. We will make it a formidable deterrent against attacks on these shores.

"We will equip our army with an expeditionary force ready for any emergency, and with strength, both at home and abroad, to carry out the soldier's traditional duties.

"In fulfilment of these onerous tasks we shall need to make sacrifices. But we shall meet them with fortitude, for we are determined to make our empire safe and strong."

divisions to capture the Balkans.

The Germans made a similar mistake, and for them it was fatal, when in the Spring and Summer of 1916 they hurled their best legions against Verdun in a vain effort to capture it.

"The blunders of Germany saved us from the consequences of our own," he writes. "But let all who trust justice to the arbitrament of war bear in mind that the issue may depend less on the righteousness of the cause than on the cunning and craft of the contestants.

"And the cost is prohibitive. It cripples all the litigants. The death of ten millions and the mutilation of another twenty millions among the best young men of a generation is a terrible bill of costs to pay in a suit for determining the responsibility and penalty for the murder of two persons, however exalted their rank."

Baruch Sees Clash Of US Trade Aims And War Isolation

N.Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—The United States is trying to travel in two opposite directions by enacting rigid wartime export restrictions and at the same time trying to develop foreign commerce through the Roosevelt-Hull reciprocal trade agreements, Bernard M. Baruch warned the House Military Affairs Committee today. The chairman of the War Industries Board during the World War testified on the Sheppard-Hill bill for industrial mobilization and limitation of profits in wartime.

Mr. Baruch posed this question:

If some foreign nations with which this country is trying to establish closer trade relations decide that the American neutrality policy may cut them off from his source of supply in their time of greatest need, will they not hesitate to build their economic life, even under the encouragement of trade concessions, on interchange of goods with the United States?

As Mr. Baruch outlined the present situation, this country, while trying to encourage foreign countries to buy more goods in the American market, is tending, by its actual and proposed neutrality legislation, toward cutting off from all belligerents supplies of commodities needed in war.

Given No Advice on Point

Mr. Baruch merely noted the apparent contradiction in policy; he did not indicate which of the two paths, if only one must be chosen, he would advise following.

This question of possible conflict between wartime export policy and foreign trade is popularly supposed to have much to do with Great Britain's hesitation to conclude a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. Its repercussions were felt at the Inter-American Conference at Buenos Aires last December. The Argentine Government, which had just renewed a trade agreement with Britain, opposed all efforts to commit the American republics to a neutrality policy that might restrict shipments of food and other commodities to Europe in time of war. It was generally supposed that this position of the Argentine delegation was supported by the British Foreign Office.

Senator Key Pittman of Nevada, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, took note today of reports that Walter Runciman, President of the Board of Trade in Britain, had received assurances of preferential treatment in this regard during his recent visit to Washington. He said the reports were "entirely without foundation."

Senator Pittman denied there was any intention in any pending neutrality legislation to give preferential treatment to Britain, France or any other nation, and pointed out that no amendments so far suggested would change that feature of the existing law that expressly provides there shall be no discrimination as between belligerents.

Tells Aim of Legislation

"I am aware," said Senator Pittman, "that any embargo will tend to injure a belligerent having control of the sea and would at the same time operate to the advantage of a belligerent which does not have sea control. The object of the legislation is to maintain the peace of the United States and to eliminate, as far as humanly possible to do so, every situation which might arise to drag us into the conflict.

"Reports that Mr. Runciman received assurances when he was in Washington recently that there would be no interference with shipments to Great Britain in the event that country became engaged in war are, in my opinion, entirely without foundation. I am satisfied the President in approving amendments I suggested had no such ideas in mind. Such an attitude would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with the administration policy of non-interference in the affairs of other nations."

Mr. Baruch told the House committee that "wars are now entirely economic in their origin." "Such wars are never won," he added. "They are only, as always, lost by the victor and the vanquished alike."

Repeating his general endorsement of the Sheppard-Hill bill, which is the most moderate of all similar bills before Congress and would give the President the widest possible latitude, Mr. Baruch nevertheless urged the committee to put a provision into the bill allowing the President to put a "ceiling" on the prices of services as well as the prices of goods in time of war.

Emphasizing that the entire nation, not just an army, must be thrown against the enemy in time of war, Mr. Baruch said that the power to commandeer and the power to control prices, in conjunction with increased taxes, would enable the war to be carried on upon a "pay-as-you-go" basis. This policy, he said, would "conserve the national resources and preserve the morale of the people to such an extent that we would be able to outlive any antagonist in a long-drawn struggle."

He warned, however, against any attempt to abolish profits entirely in wartime. He took instead the position of the bill's authors, that profits should be kept at or a little below the peace-time level. The abolition of all profit would constitute an economic experiment that might be disastrous in time of war, Mr. Baruch said. Rather he advocated abolishing the hope of wartime profits and so eliminating one cause of war.

He again stressed his insistence on a strong national defense, saying that had we been ready to fight in 1917 we would not have been subjected either to "English interference or to German insolence."

Explaining the "cash-and-carry" neutrality plan that he first suggested as a logical part of wartime isolation policy, Mr. Baruch said that if this nation were to run the risk or refusal of foreign nations to trade with us as a result of our refusal to trade with them in time of war, we must lay up at least a year's supply of those materials that we did not produce ourselves.

MEDALS AWARDED

Red Cross Orders, Olympiad Commemoration Medals, and portraits of Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler were awarded by Dr. Herbert von Dirksen, German Ambassador, on behalf of Berlin Government to those who contributed to Nazi culture at a luncheon party given at the German Embassy Monday.

Mr. Hoshiro Mitsunaga, president of Nippon Dempo Tsushinsha, Mr. Tooru Shimamine, President of the Tokyo Dental College, and Mr. Naoaki Fukui, president of the Musashino Musical Academy, were given the Red Cross Order, while Mr. Jigoro Kano and Count Michimasa Soyejima, and Mr. Ryozo Hiranuma, head of the Japanese athletic delegation to the Berlin Olympiad last summer, received the Olympiad Commemoration Medals. Portraits of the Reichsfuehrer were awarded to Mr. Genji Hasegawa, president of the Yorozuchoho, a vernacular paper, and Mr. Kinya Nagae, president of the Wakamoto Stomach-Medicine Manufacturing Company, who is a financial supporter of the Japan Institute, a cultural organization in Reipzig.

At the same time, a letter of recommendation was conveyed to Dr. Yasuhiko Asahina, a professor at the Tokyo Imperial University, who has been recommended to a scientific research institute in the Halle University.

The luncheon party, began at 1 p.m. and was brought to a close at 2 p.m.

OLYMPIC CLUB IS ORGANIZED

In order to establish goodwill relation between Japan and the foreign countries, the Olympic Club has been organized upon the proposition by Messrs. Shoichi Izawa, Nobuo Asakawa and Shiichiro Shoda. The office of the club has been opened at 1467, on the fourth floor of the New Kaijo Building, Marunouchi. With the 12th World Olympic Games in Japan, many foreigners will come to Tokyo, while in Japan, the most popular foreign language being spoken is English. German and French are the secondary languages in Japan. The aim of the new club is to promote German and French languages among Japanese who will assist those who will come to Tokyo during the next Olympic Games. Through these foreign languages, English, German and French, the members of the club will introduce real activities of driverse firms in Japan to the foreign visitors.

The club will receive anybody who has studied a foreign language for more than three years to be a member. The club fee is 5 yen for one year. The club will give a private or public course of foreign language at the club-room.

Land Reform Held Failure In Mexico

N.Y. Times

MEXICO, D. F., Feb. 7.—Communal working of lands divided among Mexican peons is failing and workers in many localities are deserting the land donated by the government, Senator David Ayala claimed today in the lead article in the important newspaper Excelsior. Official land banks and local agrarian leaders are robbing the farm workers as the great landowners did in by-gone days, Senator Ayala claimed.

Numerous killings by peons of their self-elected leaders on the communal farms, known as ejidos, were attributed by Senator Ayala to the desertion of labor by the leaders, who proceeded to rob their fellow-workers by falsifying statements to the land bank.

The banks which furnish farm workers with plows and other tools were in turn declared to be badly run.

The sum total, Senator Ayala said, was that the workers were getting further and further in debt and becoming virtual slaves just as they did under the Spaniards and great Mexican land owners.

This is the most outspoken attack yet made publicly on the Mexican land reform program which President Lazaro Cardenas has pushed on a nation-wide scale, Senator Ayala, however, explained that he was merely petitioning President Cardenas to take steps to protect the workers and to avoid the collapse of the entire land division program.

Coincidentally the communal working of land as opposed to individual exploitation in small parcels was defended by the Secretary of Agriculture, General Francisco Mugica. General Mugica declared that this system was functioning satisfactorily but that "bad direction" was responsible for the failure of some peons.

Part of Ancient System

The Mexican communal method of working large estates is the outcome of an ancient system by which farm laborers worked a common plot of ground in their spare time from wage work for large landowners.

It is capitalistic enterprise, each worker delivering to the government bank, which provides the tools and seeds, either the crop itself or, more rarely, money from the sale of the crop. What remains after the advance is deducted is divided, theoretically, among the workers. Senator Ayala claims, however, that with the leaders of each several hundred workers in many communal centers falsifying documents and the banks not investigating, the peons are ending the year with an increased debt instead of a profit.

"The failure in many localities may be laid to the zone chiefs that do not occupy themselves with the welfare of the workers," Senator Ayala said. "The workers are demoralized and end by abandoning the land given them by the Revolution and seeking wage work wherever they can find it.

"In some places the leader has actually taken the land away from persons to whom it was given. In other zones the chiefs see that the farm workers' committees are headed by persons that neither read nor write. They then falsify the negotiations with the banks. There have been many protests from workers who do not understand why they charge so much for everything. When these workers object two or three strong arm men cast them out of the community."

Plan Being Hastened

"The distribution of land will be completed in the present Presidential term and it is absolutely necessary to attack these first symptoms of disintegration and disorganization."

President Cardenas is understood to feel that his predecessors have carried out agrarian reform mostly on paper and that his successor also might balk on the division of all landed estates. He is, therefore, moved to divide all estates during his term of office and get the reform so far along that the program cannot be upset.

To this end he has travelled far and wide in Mexico and has personally supervised land division. Aides accompanying him on horseback have known him to spend a week in the hospital after one of his strenuous trips. The fear has risen in some quarters, even within President Cardenas' faction, that because of the speed of the division the program may end by collapsing.

It has naturally been impossible to tend to all the details of the administration of this vast undertaking.

Senator Ayala holds that it is merely loyalty to the present regime "to expose the truth in order that mistakes may be remedied."

"The best collaboration with the government is to tell the truth; to do otherwise is to betray it," he declared.

'Gag' Thieves Stir Hollywood's Ire

N. Y. Times

HOLLYWOOD, Feb. 7.—Producers have declared war on dialogue thieves. Secret sessions have been held in every studio in Hollywood during the last few days in an effort to devise some sort of unified plan whereby a clever group of sound stage eavesdroppers can be tracked down and brought to justice.

A number of the screen's leading comedians now at work on comedies that cannot be released for another two months have been discovering, to their chagrin, that some of the brightest gags in their scripts—gags they have been paying special writers as much as $1,000 a week to concoct—are being stolen and released on current radio programs emanating from Los Angeles stations.

Evidence of the thefts usually comes to light a few days after the actors have recorded the gags on their sound tracks. It is the belief of the studios that certain radio performers have been offering such high rewards in their wild scramble for new joke material that workers on the stages, and possibly occasional visitors, have been lured into turning over choice material from pictures in production.

Marx Brothers Angered

It would be a comparatively easy matter, they say, for the workmen standing around the sidelines as scenes are being photographed to make notes of the best gags of the comics and deliver them for radio use on the same evening.

The Marx Brothers were particularly incensed one night last week when they heard several of the best gags in their new film, "A Day at the Races," being told in millions of homes through a network program originating in a Los Angeles station.

The gags had been recorded in their film only two days before. They had been written as part of a running comedy sequence, and Al Boasberg, who draws $1,000 a week for thinking up silly things, had introduced them into the script less than ten days before the theft.

By the time the Marxes release their film, probably well after Easter, those gags will have been told and retold in every barber shop in the land—so there was nothing to do but eliminate the entire sequence. The estimated cost of that one revision alone, a studio executive said, would be about $10,000.

Burns and Allen reported during production of "College Holiday" that five of their best gags had been lifted by some person unknown and broadcast a few nights later from a radio station. In this instance, the broadcast was only local and therefore did not necessitate rewriting and remakes.

Stage Help Checked

The Ritz Brothers have been loud and bitter in their complaints of radio thefts. During production of their numbers in "On the Avenue," now being shown, they insisted on checking references from all the stage help and on a close scrutiny of visitors to the set. Practically all the Ritz gags in "Sing, Baby, Sing," their first picture, were stolen while production was under way, but the brothers didn't discover this until after it was completed.

All other Hollywood comedians are constantly worrying about the same situation. But now that studio executives have decided to take a hand in the dilemma, one that has been costing them much more money than they had imagined, it appears likely this peculiar form of thievery will soon be hatled.

And the studios propose to do it through the introduction of a new profession — the gag policeman. Every studio in Hollywood plans to put on a staff of these undercover men.

They will mingle with workers and visitors on the set and woe betide the suspect who happens to lead the gag policeman to the lair of a radio comedian. It will go mighty hard with both parties to the theft, the studios promise.

Poland To Fortify German Frontier

zlotys for roads and bridges, 56,000,000 zlotys for railways and another 50,000,000 for "investment works": 12,000,000 for electrification, 5,000,000 for harbor improvement, 15,000,000 for hydrauHc works, 14,200,000 for "various government buildings," 10,000,000 for gas installation, 2,000,000 for "fundamental land improvement," 7,800,000 for telegraph, telephone lines, 16,000,000 to be spent by the Land Reform Fund and 26,000,000 for housing.

Roads, bridges, railways, telegraph lines, harbor improvements and electrification will take military needs primarily into account. It is estimated 250,000,000 zlotys will be spent this year on roads and fortifications in the neighborhood of frontiers and on motorization of the army.

Most of this money will be spent in Western Poland, which is better off in the matter of roads and improvements than the rest of the country.

It is significant that when these proposed general expenditures were first announced all sorts of claims to share in the funds were advanced by Polish authorities in various districts on the basis of district needs. But all were turned down with the response that the national government had already arranged the objects for which and the localities where the money was to be spent.

Zenshinza Offers Kabuki, Modern Plays At Embujo

perhaps the best produced play of the month. It is called "$400,000 Indemnity" and the plot centers around the killing of an Englishman, Richardson, at Namamugi, near Yokohama, by the Satsuma clansmen. The playwright and producer try to portray the gradual decline in the power of the Tokugawa Bakufu, foreshadowing the coming of the Meiji restoration, through an episode created by the Namamugi incident.

The third play called "Under the Overhead Tramline" is a sketch of a jobless insurance salesman. In the last play by Mokuami, transition of Japan in the early Meiji era from feudalism to modernism is vividly brought out in a highly exciting melodrama.

It may be added here that the Zenshinza is the only cooperative theatrical enterprise in this country. Recently they have started on the construction of a building which is a combination of apartments for the players and rehearsal rooms.—M.

Miss Setsuko Hara famous star appearing in the film of the "New World" which has been presented here in Tokyo is leaving for Germany with Mr. Hisatora Kumagaya cinema producer and her brother-in-law at 9:30 p.m. today from Tokyo Station. She piled up her baggage at her home, Tokyo, taking some Japanese dolls and beautiful post cards depicting old Ukiyoye prints, which are her presents for her fans in Germany. She studied the German language under Mrs. Netke-Lowe for some time for her first trip to Germany.

hostess who can't decide which of the men she loves. Hers is more than a romantic role, however, for she holds up the master criminal with a gun, steps on his hand when he is reaching for a revolver to kill one of her lovers who is battling on the ground with him and also uncovers the disguise of the woman crook sought by the G-Man.

Her two lovers are Warren Hull, the reporter, and Gordon Oliver, the chief pilot, both of whom handle their parts capably. Carlyle Moore, Jr., as the co-pilot and Howard Phillips as the master mind, known as the "killer," are well cast. Winifred Shaw as a flirt and Mary Treen as an old maid teacher give fine performances.

The general effect of "Fugitive In the Sky" is one of mystery and marvelously sustained suspense. Much of this result is, of course, due to the clever photography of Fred Jackman and Ted McCord—who are an unbeatable combination of lensmen. The casting is canny, too—for the amazing company in the storm-swept hurtling plane is made up of people of such different appearance and ability that there can be no monotony. Then, probably above all, is the intelligent direction of Nick Grindle.

Others in the cast are John Litel, Gordon Elliott, Gordon Hart, Nedda Harrigan, John Kelly, Joe Cunningham and Don Barclay.

"Gargan—Pro Tem"

"William Gargan, Producer—Pro Tem."

Hollywood's popular Bill Gargan added the "Pro Tem" to this sign on a Chicago office door at the painful conclusion of his one and only experience as a theatrical producer. The play was "Not Herbert" and it lasted exactly one week, taking with it to the theatrical storehouse about $5,000 that Bill had borrowed and begged from a legion of friends who had doubted but not enough.

When Gargan speaks of this tragic interlude in his theatrical career he invariably lapses into his favorite story as a means of explanation.

"An Irishman went into a saloon," says Bill. "After a few drinks he announced that he could lick any man in New York. There were no challengers, so Mike took a few more drinks and again broke the silence with the statement that he could lick any man from the state of Massachusetts or the state of Rhode Island. Again there were no takers, so Mike imbibed some more. Finally he announced: 'I can lick any man in the entire United States.' With that he was hit on the chin by a big bruiser and knocked cold. When he was revived someone asked him what was the matter. 'Oh, nothing,' said Mike, 'only I guess I took in too much territory.'

"And that," explains Bill, "was the trouble with me as a producer. I took in too much territory. Confidence is a good thing. Overconfidence is sometimes disastrous. It has been proved many times in the fight ring and on the football field."

Gargan is co-featured with Marguerite Churchill in Columbia's new murder mystery, "Alibi For Murder."

Newest Columbia "First"

Borrowing an idea from Grace Moore, who introduced the "singing stand-in" to Hollywood, Robert Riskin, currently engaged with Harry Lachman in directing the Columbia singing star in "When You're In Love," recently inaugurated a technique on the set that requires the stand-ins to speak the lines as well as pose for camera ligkting.

Lynn Rodney, stand-in for Miss Moore, and Mal Merrihugh, stand-in for Cary Grant, who plays opposite the star, were the first to put the new rehearsal methods into practice.

In addition to walking through the scenes for lighting, Miss Rodney and Merrihugh read the lines to be spoken in the scene by the principal players.

"I find that the plan not only gives us a better feel of the scene before calling in Miss Moore and Grant for a camera take," explained Riskin, "but it saves time. While the cameraman is arranging his lighting, the sound engineer is able to get his microphone 'levels' for the entire scene and the stage is set for the cameras to grind immediately when the stars are called."

One of the first scenes in which Riskin and Lachman used their talking stand-ins was one in which Miss Moore was required to sing "Minnie The Moocher." When the time came for the song Irene Crane, the star's singing stand-in, took Miss Rodney's place.

"Perfumes"

For these many years now we have had movies that tantalize the ears with charming voices and haunting melodies. Recently the eyes have been able to feast themselves on the actual colors of far-off places as in "God's Country and the Woman" where we glimpse the woods in all their deep green splendor. Our only regret is that the fragrance of deep woods and dewy gardens can't be brought to us through the medium of the screen. Best of all it would be fun to whiff the favorite perfume scents of the stars.

Carole Lombard once said that when she used perfume she liked enough of it to give a definite aura of fragrance for blocks. Marlene Dietrich uses a fascinating kind that has definitely become a part of her. But how do you find the scent that is best suited to your own individuality?

Olivia de Havilland uses a sweet and dewy perfume that particularly expresses her youth and beauty.

"I didn't find it just by sniffing bottles at the cosmetic counter," explained Olivia when we commented on it. "I bought a number of tiny flacons of perfumes that appealed to me and gave each one the hand test. Each morning, after my bath in unscented soap, I'd rub a few drops of the scent into my hands and let it linger for an hour or two. Some perfumes didn't have the same quality when cut of the bottle; others were too Oriental or cloyingly sweet. The one I use and feel the most at home with was about the tenth one I tested."

And the tenth one is just right for Olivia. No one can tell you the kind of perfume to use, but the hand test is the ideal way to find the one that most suits your own personality.

Britain Starts Civilian Supply Of Gas Masks

Christian Science Monitor

BLACKBURN, Eng.—A new gas mask factory, which will produce 500,000 containers for civilian gas masks weekly, was opened here recently by Mr. Geoffrey Lloyd, Undersecretary of State for the Home Department, who has been charged with special responsibility in connection with air-raid precautions.

Mr. Lloyd said that the Government considered that in time of war everyone, whether rich or poor, ought to have a gas mask whether they had money to buy one or not.

Government-Owned Plant

"We hope," he said, "that they will never be needed, but if they are the Government will issue them free of charge to everyone in danger. These masks will stop every poison gas known to the Government which could be used in war."

The factory, which is government-owned, is the first of its kind in this country. It is believed to be the only factory in existence for the mass production of respirators for the civilian population.

The Air Raid Precautions Department has a staff at the factory for testing. Nothing goes into storage without having passed an efficiency test. Containers and face-pieces are being stored separately.

The containers are packed in fives into waxed cardboard cylinders to protect them from atmospheric changes. The cylinders are packed in tens into a sealed cardboard carton and sent off to storage depots.

Stored in Inert Gas

The face-pieces are being stored in an inert gas which will protect the rubber from deterioration for a very long time.

The factory is called a triumph in the application of mass production methods to an entire new production problem. Last July it was a disused mill that had been idle for three years.

The Government has made a contract with Messrs. J. E. Baxter & Co., Ltd., to manage the factory for the Air Raid Precautions Department and the whole of the production is the property of the Government.

Post Office Heroes

Motion pictures have extolled the heroism of G-Men, the intrepid courage of fire fighters and sung the praises of the army, navy and marines. Almost every branch of government service has come in for its share of recognition by Hollywood. Now comes another and little known public servant to get his just dues. He is the Postal Inspector.

This particular public servant has been visualized as a man whose uneventful life is occupied by a routine of dull activities that have to do with records, figures and massive accumulations of dry facts. In reality, his life is sometimes as thrilling and dangerous as his brother of the Department of Justice known as the G-man.

It is with this phase of the Postal Inspector's activities that "Legion of Terror," Columbia's thrilling melodrama, deals. Bruce Cabot and Crawford Weaver enact as exciting a tale as has reached the screen in many months and the story should dissipate the popular theory that a postal inspector's existence is humdrum.

"Legion of Terror" involves the tracking down and breaking up of a hooded legion, which, because of the fact that one of its members has sent a bomb through the mails, has come within the province of the Postal Department.

"Postal inspectors are interested in every form of crime that touches the mails," explained C. C. Coleman, director of the picture "A letter that contains a threat, or the purpose of which is blackmail when sent through the mails, immediately involves that department in the crime."

"Using the mails to defraud is a phrase that covers a wide territory in the daily calendar of crime. For instance, advertising meant to defraud becomes a matter for investigation by Postal Inspectors the minute a newspaper containing that advertising goes through the mails and you can readily understand the far reaching effect of this when it is realized that there is hardly a newspaper published that does not go through the post offices.

"Blackmail is a class of crime which often involves great danger in investigation and this brand of unlawful activity alone manages to keep the lives of Postal Inspectors very interesting.

"The device we use in 'Legion of Terror' to involve the Post Office department in tracking down the leaders of a hooded legion is based on record. The files of the department in Washington are filled with records of cases involving bombs. Inspectors say very little about their activities."

The story of "Legion of Terror" was written by Bert Granet. In the cast are Bruce Cabet, Marguerite Churchill, Crawford Weaver, Ward Bend, John Tyrell, Albert J. Smith and Arthur Loft.

Complete Course of

JAPANESE CONVERSATION GRAMMAR

By Mr. Oreste Vaccari and Mrs. Enko Vaccari

This new publication is the most comprehensive book for the study of Japanese ever published either here in Japan or abroad. Beginning with how to write the Japanese "kana" characters, the book is systematically arranged so as to enable the student to complete the standard of education of the Japanese.

A supplement to the grammar has been published containing Japanese onomatopoetic expressions, English idioms and English verbs followed by prepositions with corresponding idiomatic Japanese translation, an English-Japanese vocabulary, and the sixty translation exercises of the grammar printed in Roman letters and Chinese-Japanese characters with English version

Studying Japanese with this Grammar Becomes a Real Pleasure

EXTRACTS FROM THE PREFACE

Written by Count Ayské Kabayama, chairman of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai (The Society for International Cultural Relations of Tokyo).

"Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari have brought out what I would like to regard as the most complete book to date for the study of Japanese, and have, thereby, provided an effective and practical guide toward a basic study of the Japanese nation and people ....The method introduced by the authors is not only scientific, but human....the particular of the language, fully treated with practical examples, have been regulated in each lesson according to the measure of a partial effort of the mind....The Japanese taught in the book has struck me as of the best commonly accepted diction today....The authors have introduced a new system of giving all the sentences in the book in Japanese characters and Roman transliteration with their respective English translation, an innovation most likely to prove very helpful....Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari have published a book of high merit and may be regarded as the initiators of a new system for teaching Japanese.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS COMMENTS

THE JAPAN TIMES & MAIL, February 17th. These two volumes are unquestionably the most complete and best books for the study of Japanese, and have filled the long felt need for such good books among foreigners....These books will become the standard medium by which Japanese language can be mastered.

THE JAPAN ADVERTISER, February 17th. These two volumes represent a tremendous effort....Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari's book should be of great benefit to those foreigners who desire to master Japanese.

THE TOKYO NICHI NICHI, February 14th. The books recently published by Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari can be recommended as the best ones to date for the study of Japanese.

The World's Revolving Stage

there, too.

Some tourists are not tourists at all, they are visitors. They have been urged perhaps to come to Japan, to enjoy its pleasant places and contact with its friendly people. If they can disassociate themselves from the tourists who have not the same spirit, they will be given every opportunity to fulfil their expectations.

Most of these exceedingly welcome visitors to Japan have done some preparatory reading or have talked with people who have been to Japan as visitors. They have learned a few useful points. Among them are these:

Facts For Visitors

You will never profit by being discourteous to a Japanese. Not even to a servant. Kindliness will be repaid two-fold.

A Japanese, unless he has lost his self-respect, cares more about his honor than tips.

There is a tradition in Japan against receiving money from anyone directly in the hand. That is why change is returned in a tray. Until quite recently, present of money were always wrapped in paper. Envelopes are frequently used today. Even in a shop it is more polite to put the money down than pass it directly into the hand of the receiver.

Very often it is necessary to insist when making a present to a Japanese. He will, unless much experienced in foreign ways, refuse it several times before accepting. This is an old polite custom to avoid the appearance of grasping.

Many other peculiarities of Japanese life might be explained, but here is a good rule which will carry strangers through Japan in happiness and peace:

Behave always as if you were the honored guest on the estate of people whom you do not know very well.

And you will be honored.

Merchantmen Built In World Up 60 Pct. In '36

1933	10,000	133,000
1934	24,000	459,000
1935	32,000	499,000
1936	111,000	856,000

Of last year's output in the United States, 87,136 tons were launched on the Atlantic coast, and 10,627 tons on the Great Lakes, the remainder, about 13,000 tons, were built in other parts of the country.

The output of steam and motor tankers, of 1,000 gross tons and upward each, almost doubled the total figure for 1935, a gain for all countries combined of 329,000 tons being reported. Germany led, with an increase of 99,000 tons, as against 98,000 tons for Great Britain and Ireland. For the United States there was a gain of 47,000 tons, and an almost similar increase for Sweden, compared with 33,000 tons for Japan and 32,000 tons for Holland. Denmark reported a decrease of 19,000 tons. Lloyd's shows the contrast between tanker launchings in 1935 and 1936 in the following table of gross tonnage:

Germany	166,844	67,421
Great Britain and Ireland	148,797	50,795
Sweden	98,035	50,802
United States	74,040	26,522
Holland	65,961	34,486
Japan	59,968	26,653
Denmark	35,462	54,490
Other countries	18,687	26,912
World Total	667,794	338,021

Of the total tanker launchings of 667,794 gross tons, 559,690 tons were motor vessels.

For motor vessels of all types last year's launchings showed a gain of almost 50 per cent over the 1935 figures, the increase in volume amounting to 389,000 tons. Great Britain and Ireland again led in motorship construction, with an advance of 158,000 tons. Comparisons in motorship launchings during the last two years are shown below, the figures representing gross tons:

	1936	1935
Great Britain and Ireland	408,004	249,605
Germany	254,637	125,598
Sweden	150,942	104,007
Japan	139,346	110,762
Holland	86,863	46,390
Denmark	79,615	113,844
France	22,594	15,537
Italy	10,641	22,667
United States	6,173	1,465
Other countries	43,661	23,021
World Total	1,202,476	812,956

Motor vessels represented about 57 per cent of all the merchant tonnage launched last year, as compared with about 62 per cent in 1935. With the exception of 1929 and 1930, however, more motor tonnage was launched last year than ever before. How the production of these various types of vessels has compared in recent years is shown in the following tonnage table:

	Motor Vessels	Other Types
1921	306,000	4,035,000
1922	209,000	2,258,000
1923	226,000	1,417,000
1924	501,000	1,746,000
1925	843,000	1,350,000
1926	704,000	970,000
1927	863,000	1,422,000
1928	1,183,000	1,516,000
1929	1,269,000	1,524,000
1930	1,582,000	1,307,000
1931	920,000	697,000
1932	268,000	458,000
1933	337,000	151,000
1934	563,000	403,000
1935	812,000	489,000
1936	1,202,000	915,000

Comparisons of gross tonnage launched in the various countries in the last two years are shown in the following table:

	1936	1935
Great Britain and Ireland	856,257	499,011
Germany	379,981	226,343
Japan	294,861	145,914
Sweden	154,044	105,538
United States	111,885	32,607
Denmark	97,537	122,095
Holland	93,831	57,133
France	39,208	42,783
Norway	33,162	25,716
Italy	11,345	22,667

Largest of the vessels launched during 1936 was the Orcades, of 23,400 gross tons, built in England.

YOUNG POETESS DISCOVERED

The genius of an unknown young lyric poet named Miss Haruko Kitazaki, 18 years old student of the Kyoka Higher Girl's School at Kanda, was found by Miss Tokiwa Shizuka, the well known soprano recently.

A few months ago when she read her poems, she was much moved and decided to introduce her to the public by recommending her work to a certain gramophone company. The poem will be made public by Miss Shizuka when she will make a recording of it in a few days.

Miss Kitazawa's ambition is to be a great woman poet like Mrs. Akiko Yosano.

Spanish Monarchists Ask Alfonso To Abdicate

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, March 8—An interesting side-light was shed upon the Spanish imbroglio today when it was revealed here that influential Spanish monarchists have recently approached the exiled ruler of Spain, King Alfonso XIII, with a request that he abdicate in favor of his eldest son, Prince Asturias.

It is reported that Spanish monarchist circles hold that King Alfonso's abdication would facilitate possible restoration of the Bourbon monarchy to Spain.

who wrote "Journey to the End of the Night." His second novel, "Death on the Installment Plan," is now being translated from the French.

The author described his work in a suburb of Paris where he ministers to the poor classes. He calls on about thirty patients a day and steals an hour now and then to do his writing. "I steal hours which I should devote to medicine and to my bosses," he said. Under the circumstances he sets a definite amount of work for himself each day, writing about 10 pages every twenty-four hours and revising endlessly. He estimated that each book represented about 70,000 pages of script, most of which is eventually thrown away.

Helen Keller Returns

Another passenger was Helen Keller, who returned from her annual trip to Scotland, accompanied by her friend and guide, Miss Polly Thompson, who has been with her for twenty-three years. Miss Keller, who devotes all of her time to aiding others who are sightless and dumb, went to Paris last month to speak at ceremonies commemorating Thomas Paine.

"I was glad to be in Paris in the Winter time," she said, "because it is the true Paris of old France."

While there she visited the Louvre and other museums, some for the first time; and she was inspired by her first "sight" of Rodin's "The Thinker," and other famous sculptures which she studied through her fingertips, by special permission of the curator. She said that the thrill of her study of "The Thinker" was the greatest she had had since her teacher years ago "spelled the word 'water' in my hand."

lations as to destroy the purchasing power of large sections of the population. We want price and wage policies which will give purchasing power to consumers sufficient to move an ever-increasing quantity of goods into consumption. We want the prices and production of goods by corporations to be in fair balance with the prices and production of farm products and other goods.

"Can we get these things by continuing to grant Federal powers to corporations without requiring that the powers be used more consciously in behalf of the general good?

"Apparently there is needed some type of interindustry planning which will make possible the determination of price policy, production policy and wage policy in a manner which does not result in the rigidities and scarcities sought by industry under the powers of NRA, but which does result in expanding production on a safe and balanced basis, with the benefits of that increased production going fairly to capital, to management, to labor and to consumer.

"Are we not at a point now where some serious thought must be given to reconsidering the nature of modern government expenditures? Should not more be spent for social services that will expand purchasing power in the hands of consumers and less be spent on projects that lead to inactive savings and to intensifying activity in capital goods?"

Dickens' Books Still Best Sellers On Anniversary

nightcap and extinguished his candle with the snuffers." Only a slice of the inn is visible, the greater portion of the exterior being eclipsed by the gray office giants crowding about it.

Familiar names cling, but few of the revered spots have been able to withstand the onslaughts of progress. And so the London of Dickens is changing. Up the river and down the river, in East End and West, not only is it showing a transformation in its physical aspects, but there are also signs of a new reaction to the glories of the festive season upon which Dickens more than any other man left his impress.

Enduring Demand for Writings

Christmas still finds the fruiterers gay, the poulterers cheery, the grocers bright. Yet thousands of persons now take to the country and the seaside, where hotels do the catering which a servant problem has made almost impossible at home, while many of those who remain in the city turn on the radio and enjoy the synthetic entertainment which is rapidly ousting the homemade product. Has the spontaneity of Dickens's day survived? The question is not easy to answer.

Yet with all the changes in customs and tastes, the works of Dickens still have a premier place in the hearts of the people. Tested by publishers' figures, by box-office receipts at picture shows, or by membership in the Fellowship which perpetuates Dickens's name, the writings of the illustrious author reveal a demand which is as enduring as it is extensive.

Finland Tells Russia Subtly Not To Worry

MOSCOW, Feb. 13—The visit to Moscow of Rudolf Holsti, Foreign Minister of Finland, although producing no new treaties or specific agreements, probably should be considered an event of major importance to the Soviet Union in the present state of international affairs, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. Apparently the main purpose of the visit was nothing more than to make a friendly gesture to show the Soviets that all the unkind things they had been hearing about their small but strategically situated neighbor were not true.

The chief of those bits of political gossip had been that Finland was so Nazi in sympathy that it probably would serve as a military base for Germany in case of war with the Soviet Union.

Although Holsti's name is not often in European headlines, he is quite a solid statesman. One chapter out of his past which some Americans recall is that it was Holsti single-handed who brought American relief to Finland after the war at a time when much of the population was threatened with starvation.

Holsti Met Litvinov

Holsti and Maxim M. Litvinov, Commissar for Foreign Affairs, had several conversations during his visit, and the report was that they had decided the existing treaty of non-aggression was all that was needed along that line, but that "both of the friendly parties arrived at the conclusion that there is a possibility of continued development and strengthening of the friendly relations between the countries, for which both countries will work."

Finland and the Soviet Union have 1,800 kilometers of common frontier, and any one who have been near it is likely to gather the impression that they haven't been very friendly neighbors. The entire border is one long stretch of barbed wire heavily policed by troops, and, on the Soviet side at least, is set aside as a frontier zone which may not be entered without special permission.

This correspondent was at Karelia, an autonomous republic on the Soviet side of the border, about a year ago at a moment when feelings were not friendly. Nightly it was possible to turn the radio dial and hear from Helsingfors the most half-raising descriptions of starvation, dissensions, and other calamities—one story particularly about the cathedral being dynamited was a whopper—which were announced to be taking place in Karelia.

Finn Population Large

Certainly Karelia is not a soft place. It is a Russian version of the Northwest woods, and no place for those who want their living easy. But, and particularly because of its large and relatively enlightened Finnish population, it certainly is not anything like the madhouse the Finnish radio was talking about at that time.

Any one who lives in Europe these days and owns a radio knows how full the air is of tall tales, but the situation between Finland and the Soviet Union has some peculiar characteristics of its own. It has not been long since the Premier of the Karelian republic was removed and a general political clean-up was carried out. The growth of a sort of Finnish Nationalist movement in Karelia was the reason.

There has never been any evidence that it went so far as to plan an escape from the Soviet Union and an attachment to Finland. However, hostile elements across the border in Finland evidently took advantage of the situation. It may be doubtful whether there ever has been any serious worry in the Soviet Union about the particular problem of Finnish Nationalist feeling on this side of the border. Between that and a Finland so pro-Nazi and anti-Soviet that it might fall in with any designs Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler has against this country there is considerable distance.

Holsti seems to have come here—judging from the report of the conversations with Litvinov and by what he told the American correspondents when they met at the home of Joseph E. Davies, American Ambassador to the Soviet Union—principally to dispel that fear, and to try to create a more neighborly feeling.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Real Bullets

Being shot at with real bullets is no way of passing a pleasant half hour. Take it from Hal Price, who had the experience at Columbia Studios while filming in "A Man Without Fear," starring Jack Holt.

The scene called for a gun fight between Holt and Price and, in order to make the scene authentic Director Erle Kenton decided to photograph the bullets striking the walls on both sides of Price.

To get the scene safely, a special bullet-proof set was constructed and Earl Bunn, former army expert rifleman, was engaged to do the shooting from behind the camera. The camera was trained on Price and started. Then everyone, including the cameraman and director, left the set leaving Price and Bunn alone.

When Price emerged from the set he uttered a sign of relief.

"Boy," said Hal, "don't ever let anyone tell you that we actors don't suffer for our art's sake!

Ready Answer

"Johnny," said the rather strict parent, "is it possible you are playing with your soldiers on the Sabbath?"

"Oh, it's all right, Mummy," replied the youngster, "it's the Salvation Army."—Edinburgh Dispatch.

Surgery Applied To Medical Costs

Literary Digest

If all the doctors in the United States had occupied adjoining offices, and if some medical dictator had padlocked each alternate door and tacked up the sign, "Closed Because of Unemployment," the 50 per cent remaining in active practice could easily have cared for all the patients who received medical attention last year.

But if every person who should have had medical care had actually received it, there would have been no unemployed surplus of physicians, dentists and nurses. There would have been an acute shortage. One reliable survey estimates that 47 per cent of the people in the lowest income group receive no medical or dental service whatever.

In the middle income class, a family may suddenly be stricken with a major illness, be staggered by a sickness bill of $200, $500 or more which may throw its modest budget out of line for years. Wealthy patients grumble over the sliding-fee charges of physicians, asserting that they are penalized because they happen to be able to pay. Hospitals rely on taxes and turn to contributions to keep their doors open. Highly trained physicians and nurses go on relief; in 1933 there were 400 doctors on relief in Chicago alone.

From these and a dozen other sources come anguished protests that America's system of medical economics is badly out of joint. To remedy the system, to bring medical service within the reach of low and middle income groups who can not budget for it or who shy away from charity, a plan for national health insurance has been proposed and has recently gained such headway that organized physicians are drawing up their lines of battle to oppose it.

Progress

Health insurance progress may be gauged by the following facts: (1) Sen. Arthur Capper, of Kansas, will introduce the model health insurance bill of the American Association for Social Security in the Senate this session. (2) The Social Security Board is studying various plans of health insurance. (3) The American Federation of Labor will ask President Roosevelt to set up a Federal Commission to recommend sickness insurance legislation. (4) Two weeks ago, President Roosevelt startled Congress by requesting a reorganization of the Government involving two new Cabinet portfolios, one to be a Secretary of Public Welfare (physicians fear this as a first step toward socialized medicine). (5) Health insurance was considered as a provision of the Social Security Act, but was omitted from the draft of the bill because of the pressure of organized physicians. (6) President Roosevelt has not committed himself on health insurance, but physicians frankly fear that his attitude is favorable; if the President indorses a health insurance measure, its chances of passing Congress are excellent.

At the moment, the whole subject of health insurance is highly controversial, is amazingly complicated by confusions, contradictions, disagreements, name-calling, internecine schisms and political jockeying. It is vitally important because it would affect all classes of the population, probably would involve new taxes, certainly would require pay-roll deductions, and in turn, at least theoretically, would provide medical service and sickness benefits.

Two facts dominate the situation currently: (1) The problem is packed with dynamite. (2) The country will not have health insurance this year, probably not next year, but observers are confident that it will come eventually as the third leg of the Social Security structure.

Definition

Health insurance arguments are complicated by the fact that disputants often use the terms, "State medicine," "socialized medicine," and "health insurance" interchangeably. State medicine is the particular straw man which physicians rip to shreds. Soviet Russia is the only nation in the world to espouse State medicine. In Russia medical service is free to all citizens, is paid for by public funds and administered by public servants. Socialized medicine describes health insurance only to the extent that private practitioners may be paid from general tax funds. The bulk of the money for health insurance comes from the contributions of the insured.

Essentially, health insurance is not a system of medical practice at all. It is a pooling of the funds of individuals to provide money for paying private practitioners who care for them when they are ill. Sickness strikes suddenly, unpredictably. A man may go along for fifty years with no other medical expenditures than casual purchases of aspirin and cough-syrup, and then abruptly be faced with a bill for a major operation and weeks of hospital care. It is estimated that only families with annual incomes of $5,000 or more can properly budget for medical care. Health insurance, its proponents maintain, would do this budgeting on a national scale at an estimated cost of 6 per cent of the worker's salary.

Medical service is a big business, ranking sixth in the national scale. From 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 Americans are always sick. To minister to them, 1,000,000 persons are engaged in an industry capitalized at $6,000,000,000. The cash turnover is $3,600,000,000, which represents the annual sickness bill of the United States. Drugs, medicines, hospitals and institutions annually receive $1,700,000,000 of the ailing American's money. This income supports 530,000 persons engaged in those trades. Doctors, dentists, nurses, cultists, etc., to the number of 554,000, receive $1,900,000,000.

Americans spent twenty billions a year on luxuries and non-essential; certainly $3,600,000,000 a year for medical care is not excessive if spread over the whole population. Excluding amounts paid from public funds, the average family has a yearly health bill of $108. The only trouble is that there is no such thing as an average family. In a normal year, half of all individuals have no sicknesses at all, one-third have one illness, one-sixth two illnesses, a few three, four, or five illnesses. But 10 per cent of the nation's families, incurring charges of more than $250, pay 41 per cent of the country's sickness bill. Illnesses vary greatly in cost. A cold or digestive upset costs, on an average, $6; pneumonia $59; a confinement, $95; appendicitis $168; cancer, ¥342. These figures are drawn from the exhaustive studies of the Committee on Costs of Medical Care, which in 1932 issued a twenty-three-volume report.

Doctor's Dilemma

The most effective opposition to health insurance comes from doctors. Yet physicians are by no means unanimous in their opposition. They, too, are faced by acute economic problems. A young man spends $25,000 to $30,000 on a medical education, hangs out his shingle and is soon puzzled as to whether he is a business man or a public servant. Professional ethics, with its ban on advertising, its obligation to charitable service, emphasizes the public servant angle. But the doctor soon learns that overhead expenses eat up a good 50 per cent of his gross income. He has to have costly equipment if he is to do his job; X-ray machines, fluoroscopes, surgical instruments, metabolism testers, a freshly laundered receptionist.

Small wonder, then, that for every physician with a net income of $10,000, there are two with incomes of less than $2,500. Only 30 per cent of the average physician's charges are collectable. Not enough people can pay for medical care to enable enough doctors to make a reasonably good living. Many potential patients use city hospitals, enroll in commercial insurance plans or industrial clinics, or gravitate to quacks or self-treatment. Patent medicines, self-prescribed, move quickly off the druggist's shelf, but prescription business has dwindled until now the average number of prescriptions compounded in a year by a pharmacist is 1,200—slightly over three a day, although he is equipped to produce ten times that number.

Out of economic pressure, then, is born the willingness of the younger physician to accept health insurance with its apparent assurance of a steady income through providing the patient the wherewithal with which to pay. He can, if he is fortunate, get a staff job in a clinic, become associated with an insurance company or an industrial organization. If he remains in an unremunerative private practice, he can, if he is strong-willed, resist minor form of medical racketeering—fee-splitting, unnecessary operations, and the like. Men in established practice point out that it is merely a case of the survival of the fittest. The point that health insurance advocates stress is the appalling waste of trained talent badly needed by the sick and the underprivileged.

Opposition

Organized opposition to compulsory State health insurance centers in the powerful American Medical Association, headed by puissant, persuasive and practical Dr. Morris Fishbein. The A. M. A. is the largest medical organization in the world, boasts some 120,000 members, represents about two-thirds of all American doctors. It is a pyramidal association built up on County and State Medical Societies.

Its steadfast opposition to national compulsory health insurance is based mainly on these contentions: (1) Administrative cost would be prohibitively high. (2) It would destroy the personal relationship between physician and patient. (3) It would make the physician subject to political control. (4) It would destroy the incentive to progress which exists under private practice. (5) It would subject medicine to the domination of laymen. (6) It would tend to an inferior type of treatment through requiring the doctor to take care of more patients than he could normally handle. (7) Its costs would be excessively high and would involve burdensome taxation.

The extent to which the A. M. A. is a camp divided against itself is impossible to estimate. At least two State Medical Societies have opposed the association's stand on health insurance, and the American College of Surgeons in 1934 came out in vigorous opposition.

Battle Gauge

Outstanding in its acceptance of the gauge of battle is the American Association for Social Security, which is largely Abraham Epstein, its Executive Secretary. Epstein is a slight, mild, battle-wise polemic, without illusions and possessed of an extraordinary tactical resiliency. Crushed to earth, he has risen time and time again.

In the period between 1915 and 1920, he saw health insurance winning its battle, following the success of workmen's compensation laws, which remains today the only U.S. experiment in health insurance. In that time a bill was actually passed by the New York Senate; killed, its backers charged, by medical opposition. At that time, too, labor was opposed to health insurance.

But recently Epstein returned from Washington, quietly reported the winning over of William Green and the American Federation of Labor; reported, also, that the Association's Model Health Insurance Bill will be presented in the Pennsylvania and New York Legislatures, as it has already been in Massachusetts.

Model Bill

The provisions of what is sometimes called the Epstein Bill, which was largely drafted by Prof. Herman A. Gray, of the New York University Law School, include the principles which probably will be adopted when and if health insurance becomes a statute. It would (1) be compulsory for all workers under certain wage levels, probably $3,000 per annum; (2) assess a 6 per cent wage contribution, the State to provide 1½ per cent, the remaining 4½ per cent divided between employer and employe; (3) provide health services and cash benefits not to exceed $15 a week for a period not to exceed twenty-six weeks; (4) allow persons with incomes of more than $3,000 to join voluntarily.

There would be no compulsion for physicians to enroll in the panel (the term used to describe the list of physicians who may be consulted by the insured when they fall ill). Presumably there would be enough physicians voluntarily enrolled to allow the patient as wide a choice of doctors as is now available to him.

Health insurance advocates cheerfully point out an inconsistency in the stand of their opponents, who insist that medical experts control administration, yet that the layman be free to choose his own doctor—whose actual technical skill the layman is incapable of judging.

"Objections to the effect that the personal relationship between the physician and patient would be completely lost are entirely unfounded," says Mr. Epstein. "Compulsory insurance permits the free choice of doctors by patients, as well as the right of the doctors to refuse to treat certain patients."

History

For years, European countries have had health insurance as a phase of social security legislation. I. F. Falk, in "Security Against Sickness," (Doubleday, Doran), his monumental study of health insurances, ably analyzes the various foreign systems as pointing the way to a basic American program. Bismarck, in 1883, gave Germany the first compulsory health insurance system. Austria followed in 1888. Other countries rapidly fell in line, until at present, says Mr. Falk, no major European State is without some form of health insurance. Lloyd George, in 1911, pushed a program through to acceptance in Great Britain, despite the opposition of the British Medical Association. Significantly enough, the bitter opposition of British medicine dwindled, until a few years ago the Association adopted a resolution almost without dissent asking for an extension the present Act. Most European plans provide the services of physicians, nurses, hospitals, pay for some medicines. Cost is borne by premiums from the worker's wages, employer contributions, some Government funds.

Tactics

These, then, are the broad lines of conflict along which the forthcoming health insurance battle may be expected to rage. Journals of the medical profession are frankly alarmed, are calling upon physicians to enlist actively in the cause, lest State medicine be thrust down their throats. Representative of the intense interest of the profession in an effective plan of campaign is the following editorial excerpt from the December issue of Medical Economics:

"In what way can the physician's influence be brought to bear? There are numerous mediums—legislative lobbies, newspaper and radio publicity, contacts with those who mold the opinions of large blocs, the dissemination of printed literature, and personal chats with patients during the course of every-day practice.

"Lobbies in various State Capitals have done a commendable job in obstructing State medicine so far. Their real test, however, will come this winter....No less important is it to maintain contact with large employers, publishers, directors of clubs and federations, and other individuals known to play a part in public opinion.

"Every physician was urged last year to tell his patients about the dangers of State medicine. Many did so. The work was done quietly, but it was effective. It cooled off the legislators in the Capitol. It cooled off the occupants of the White House."

If health insurance comes up in Congress this session, who may be expected to support it? In the House of Representatives, Beiter, Tolan and Conney probably would espouse the cause; in the Senate, Wheeler, Capper, Frazier, Black and Wagner. In general, Congress doesn't know what action should be taken, but is eager to find out. The general feeling is that health insurance should be a State plan, as under the present Social Security Act, and as provided for by the model Epstein Bill. If President Roosevelt recommends such legislation, the probability of passage is excellent. That is why the opposition roundly resents the fact that at no time has the President definitely stated that he is opposed to health insurance. The best that a committee of doctors was able to get in the way of a statement was a remark by the President in a New Jersey speech before election:

"The medical profession can rest assured that the Federal Administration contemplates no action detrimental to their interest."

So There!

"Little boy, why aren't you in school?"

"Hell, lady I ain't but three years old!"

Protect Russian Women Against White-Slavery

League To Appoint Agent In Far East To Take Special Charge Of Co-ordinative Measures

Closer cooperation between the police and other authorities in their work against white-slavery, abolition of licensed or tolerated houses, and the appointment of an agent of the League of Nations in the Far East to take special charge of the co-ordinative measures necessary to secure the future of women of Russian origin were among the measures adopted at the Conference of Central Authorities in Eastern Countries held at Bandoeng, Java, recently.

In order to promote such cooperation as desired between the authorities, the Conference has recommended the creation of a Bureau of the League of Nations in the East to receive regular reports from all participating countries in regard to traffic in women and children, and to circulate such reports to all participating countries. Among other things, such reports are to contain information concerning men and women convicted of trafficking.

The conference was convened on February 2 by the head of the Anti-Opium and Social Affairs Section on behalf of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, acting on the decision taken by the Council at a recent session. Invitations were issued by the Secretary-General to the Governments, international organizations and missions. Among those who took part in the conference were representatives of the Governments of the Straits Settlements and Federated Malay States, Hongkong, France, India, Japan, Netherlands, Portugal, Siam, and a group of missions, international voluntary organizations, national, regional and local organizations, and experts.

The Agenda

Jhr. A. J. Baud, first delegate of the Natherlands and Mrs. S. C. Mukerjee, delegate of India, were elected as president and vice-president respectively of the conference, while Miss M. Malthe, former member of the Commission of Enquiry into Traffic in Women and Children in the East, was invited to attend as expert. The agenda consisted of the following points:

1. Closer collaboration and wider exchange of information between the police and other authorities in the different countries who are responsible for measures concerning the prevention of traffic in women and children in the East;

2. Migration, in so far as this question affects the protection of migrants against traffic in women and children;

3. Possibility of abolishing licensed or tolerated brothels in the East;

4. Closer collaboration between police and other authorities and private organizations in the East;

5. Possibility of employing a larger number of women officials by the authorities responsible for the welfare of women and children, and

6. Problem of women refugees of Russian origin in the Far East who have been or are in danger of becoming victims of the traffic.

Altogether eleven meetings were held between February 2 and February 13, during which the conference was convinced that a closer cooperation between the authorities was the most essential factor of successful action against white-slavery. Attention was also drawn to the need of closer cooperation between the Chinese police and the police of foreign concessions and settlements on the coast of China in the fight against this evil.

League's Bureau for East

In addition to the recommendation for the creation of a Bureau of the League in the Far East for the exchange of information, the conference decided that the League should be asked to approach all interested Governments with a view to bringing about closer cooperation between the police authorities of all Governments concerned and with a view to the holding of local conferences where necessary for the consideration of measures more effective for the prevention of traffic in women and children. The conference also decided that adequate provision should be made by legislation, by international arrangements or otherwise to enable the proper authorities to arrest traffickers on board vessels when actual attempts are being made to land their victims.

Satisfaction was expressed by those who attended at the measures taken at the port of Hongkong for the examination of female and minor emigrants and the provision of photographs for their identification. With a view to dealing more effectively with the problem, the participants decided to request the Hongkong Government to consider the extension of the provisions in force regulating the control of emigrants, to cover the case of female and minor passengers on other than "emigrant ships." Hope was also expressed that similar measures might be adopted at other ports in the East.

Among other stringent measures adopted at the conference were the following that special measures should be taken by Governments both by control at frontiers and by supervision within their territories for the protection against traffic in women and children who belong to or accompany travelling troups of entertainers, and that Government should make arrangements, if necessary, regulations under which their national shipping should collaborate with port authorities generally in order to prevent traffic in women and children and especially to secure that reasonable precautions are taken by steamship companies to prevent the evasion by female and minor emigrants of any examination instituted with a view to the protection of such persons by the authorities at the ports of departure or arrival of the ships.

Abolition of Brothels

Dealing with the problem of abolition of licence or tolerated houses, the delegates voted in favor of the abolition as a final goal for the eradication of white-slavery. It was decided that educational measures be taken for the formation of a favorable public opinion in those countries in the East in which tolerated brothels still exist and that abolition should in all cases be anticipated or accompanied by administrative, medical and social measures in order to guarantee the permanence of its success.

Interesting reports were made of the beneficial activities of voluntary organizations, their readiness to extend their activities and to give their cooperation in a greater measure in the social welfare work, and the success in the appointment in a number of countries in the East of women officials on work connected with the welfare of women and children. So impressed was the conference with these reports that the gathering decided to urge the Governments to welcome practical cooperation with these organizations and to consider the possibility of employing a larger number of women officials on the welfare work.

To Protect Russian Women

Finally, the problem of the future of women of Russian origin was brought up for discussion. Especially brought to the attention of the gathering by the Assembly of the League of Nations, the question was given the greatest importance, it being held as a challenge to the social conscience of right-thinking people. After deliberations, it was decided that voluntary organizations, other bodies and individuals interested in this work should be impressed on the absolute necessity of raising funds of an amount that will enable an agent of the League of Nations to be appointed in the Far East to take special charge of the co-ordinative measures necessary to secure the future of these women of Russian origin. It might be recalled that the Assembly of the League of Nations in 1935 adopted a resolution authorizing the Secretary-General of the League to endeavour to secure the services of a competent person (preferably a woman), resident in the Far East, or in a position to proceed there, who could act as Agent of the League, provided that such an appointment involved no financial charge upon the League.

From Bandit To Warlord

known later as the "Young Marshal." His unorthodox union with the daughter of the estimable Chao household gave Chang thereafter a certain social standing. It was one of his many lucky strikes.

The Chang band grew in number in the closing years of the 19th century, while the Russians were rushing their railway construction from Harbin southwards to Port Arthur, and the Chinese Government's influence and authority was waning fast in Manchuria. The Russians strove to consolidate their power along the new railway zone, hiring native "bandit-tamers" to check brigand depredations on their railway properties.

So the assorted bandits in Fengtien Province formed into two hostile groups: those hired by the Russians as counterbandits, operating under Colonel Matrietoff, and those raiding the new railway zone and its installations. The Chang Tso-lin outfit was of the latter group and the whole of Manchuria was in turmoil.

The Peking Imperial Government then sent General Tsung Chi-liu to Mukden, to restore some resemblance of order in that tumultuous country. He ordered all bandits to capitulate at once to the Mukden authorities, promising full pardon and decent employment. Chang seized the golden opportunity and surrendered to the government. He was then ordered by General Tsung to form his 200 outlaws into a government garrison for Hsinmintun.

So, at the age of 28 Chang Tso-lin became the commander of an important market town west of Mukden, and cleverly used his opportunity to build up his fortune. He speculated busily on the Hsinmintun produce exchange, secretly manipulating the market to suit his speculations. In a short time he had piled up a tidy sum of about 100,000 yuan. He spent it mainly in buying and reclaiming a large marshy tract near Panshan, and settling thereon a group of peasants to till his new domain.

Then came the Russo-Japanese War. Chang supplied the Russian troops with many carts, much hay and grain, collected by his men from all parts of the fertile Hsinmintun district. Chang's soldiers also acted as guides and scouts for the Russian cavalry leader, Major-General Mischenko. But neither Chang nor his followers actually fought on either side during the big war.

When the Japanese Army under Marshal Oyama captured Mukden Chang realized that he had backed the loser, and his position became precarious. He lost no time in seeking pardon from the Japanese authorities, promising to aid them in the same manner he had been helping the Russians.

He was pardoned, and in token of his capitulation he brought to the Japanese Army 500 carts laden with grain and fodder that he had collected for the retreating Russians. He rendered similar useful services for the rest of the war.

Chang received much material and moral support thereafter from the Japanese authorites in Manchuria. With their aid he rose to supreme power in Manchuria. With his power and authority consolidated he became less grateful, less constant in his professed friendship for Japan. He met a tragic death, and was buried away from his grandiose and partially finished mausoleum.

New 'Peking Man' Discovered: May Upset Savants' Theories

PEIPING—The recent discovery and evaluation here of two further "men" belonging to the same period as the world-famous "Peking Man" (Sinanthropus Pekinensis) promises to throw much more light on the nature of primitive man as he existed in Lower Pleistocene times, roughly 500,000 years ago, and may even necessitate revision of anthropological theories now held in wide repute.

When P. L. Chia, a Chinese field worker belonging to the China Geological Survey's Coenozoic Laboratory here, noticed human bones being uncovered by workmen last Nov. 15 at Choukuotien in the same stratum where Sinanthropus was first brought to light in 1929, he ordered all work stopped immediately. The area was carefully roped off and guarded. Excavation was painstakingly carried on bit by bit until the fragments composing two brain cases were collected. These were brought into Peiping to the Rockefeller Union Medical College where, under the direction of Dr. Franz Weidenreich, head of the Coenozoic Laboratory which is conducted with Rockefeller funds, the remains were reconstructed.

Two Adults

The new skulls are unquestionably contemporary with the original Sinanthropus, but represent adults, whereas the first Peking Man is now believed to have been a boy about eight years of age. The new remains are fairly complete and judging by modern human standards they represent a woman of about 50 and a man of 40 years of age.

Several avenues of thought concerning Sinanthropus and related types of early men are now considerably widened and clarified as a result of findings produced by analyses of the new skulls, says Dr. Weidenreich.

First, the female shows essential similarities in the lowness of the skull to that of the famous Trinil Man, or Pithecanthropus Erectus, found in Java 40 years ago and long thought to have been a great fossil gibbon. Weidenreich now believes that Pithecanthropus was closely related to the Peking Man, who has been conclusively proved human through his association with fire, stone implements, and other indications of human culture found in the Choukoutaien cave. Pithecanthropus was therefore also a true man, says Dr. Weidenreich, and may have been more advanced than the Peking Man.

In the new male skull he finds greater height which closely approaches the European Neandertal group so that a continuous line of evolution from the Sinanthropus stage leading to the Neandertal and on to present-day man is apparent.

Sinanthropus bears certain jaw-bone resemblances to Mongols, Eskimos, and American Indians.

"The new discoveries are therefore of great importance for the history of human evolution," says Dr. Weidenreich, "and banish all possible objection to the theory that man evolved from anthropoid-like hominids." Sinanthropus is established to be the earliest known human being, and his skull characteristics are similar to those common among orange-outangs and gorillas.

Bones obtained during the past seven years from the Choukoutien cave 30 miles southwest of here now constitute the greatest store of human fossils in the world. Altogether some 24 individuals are represented by fragments of various kinds.

He Was a Cannibal

For all his dignified Latin name, Sinanhropus today faces a mass of evidence that shows he was probably a head-hunting cannibal.

As Coenozoic research men here reconstruct the picture of the life and times of the Peking Man from details worked out in the past seven years, a fairly completely but startling conception emerges.

Abundant fossil remains of various animals have been found in the same cave which indicate that the Peking Man lived among such creatures as mastodons, cave tigers, bears, rhinoceri, and hyenas. Horses, antelope, camels, ostriches and other modern forms existed in primitive types. Sinathropus must have lived largely on meat, as the bone of many animals have been found, broken in a way that betrays the hand of man.

The cave at Choukoutien is the only human fossil source in the world which has continued to grow in importance and richness of its yield. Several years will be required to work over and evaluate all the paleolithic material which has been excavated and which remains to be removed from the rock.

The Spre

Hunger

"I wish we'd get a few shipwrecked sailors washed ashore," mused the cannibal chief. "What I need is a good dose of salts."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Luck of Eden Hall

This cup, one of the finest specimens of early glass, has long been in the possession of the Musgrave family of Eden Hall, Cumberland, England. It is reputed to have been seized from the "little people" by a retainer of the family at St. Cuthbert's Well, a pure water source on the estate. The Queen of the "little people" is reputed to have exclaimed, "Should the cup e'er break or fall, Farewell the Luck of Eden Hall."

The goblet is of an enamel-and-gold pattern, colored green, white, red and blue, and has long been kept in the vaults of the Bank of England to insure the continuance of the family fortunes. It is the subject of many ballads and legends.

Rat-Tail Money

Rats escaping from a shipwreck to Lord Howe's Island about 360 miles east of Australia, presently multiplied so that they overran the island. The British Government offered a bounty of 8 cents for each rat killed to be paid upon the surrender of the rate's tail. The tails soon became so closely identified with the bounty, that metallic money could be dispensed with, while the tail itself acquired an intrinsic value equal to 8 cents.

Social and Personal Notes

ENTERTAINS AT BUFFET SUPPER

Miss Mary Vile entertained at buffet supper Saturday before the interport dance held at the Y.C.A.C. Her guests were Miss Angela Bamford Smith, Miss Rose Brogan, Miss Mildred Hamilton, Miss Marguerite Graham, Mr. Ian Lloyd, Mr. T. Eckersley, Mr. E. Levedag Jr., Mr. David Thorn and Mr. John Graham.

NIPPON CULTURAL FEDERATION MEETING

The first of a series of weekly lectures on the Study of the Japanese Sword, History of the Japanese Sword, Heian Period will be given at the New Osaka Building (Room 453) from 11 to 12 a.m. Wednesday. Rare specimens of the genuine Japanese swords from the collection of Mr. Sojiro Sutoh will be on view

ASSOCIATION OF FOREIGN TEACHERS

The ninth annual conference of foreign teachers will be held in Tokyo from March 31 to April 2. All meetings, supper and banquet will be at the Okuma Kaikan, Waseda.

The supper and social will be at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday, March 31.

TO RETURN

Mr. D. H. Blake will return from his trip to Manila by the Scharnhorst which is due in Yokohama Wednesday or Thursday.

LEAVE FOR KYOTO

Mr. and Mrs. John K. Emmerson and Mr. Beppo Johansen who have just returned to Tokyo from Nikko will leave for an extended stay in Kyoto Tuesday.

NEW CLASSIC ART SOCIETY EXHIBITION

The exhibition of the New Classic Art Society will be held at the Shiseido Art Galleries, Ginza, from March 16 to 18. The members of the society are mostly oil painters, while some sculptures will also be shown at the show.

THE ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE SHINZOKEI

The annual exhibition of the Shinzokei Art Society will be open at the Tokyo Prefectural Art Galleries, Uyeno Park, from March 16 to 25.

MR. MISCHA TO RETURN

Mr. Mischa Elman, world famous violin virtuoso who made a great success at his recitals in Tokyo recently, will return to Tokyo from Shanghai at the beginning of April. He will hold a recital at the Hibiya Public Hall, on April 13.

LEAVE YOKOHAMA

The Ecuadorian Consul General and the Panama Consul in Yokohama left for Nagoya to attend the inauguration ceremony of the International Pan-Pacific Exposition Sunday. They attended the banquet given by H. I. H. Prince Higashikuni and expect to return to Yokohama today.

TO HOLD RECEPTION

On the occasion of the Imperial birthday anniversary of His Majesty Reza Shah Pahlavi, the Iranian Minister and Mrs. Azimi will receive colleagues and friends at the Legation between the hours of 4 to 6:30 p.m. today.

LEAVE TOKYO

The First Secretary of the Embassy of the U. S. S. R. and Mrs. Arkadii Askoff will leave Tokyo today, leaving from Tokyo Station at 10 p.m.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB

The chairman of the Music Committee of the International Women's Club of Yokohama has announced that owing to unavoidable circumstances the concert scheduled for 9 p.m. Friday, April 9, has been changed to 9 p.m. Thursday, April 8.

The artists of the evening will be Professor Robert Pollak, Violinist, and Mr. Arnold Bauer, vocalist.

ON BOARD KASHIMA MARU

Among the passengers who sailed on board the N.Y.K. liner Kashima Maru at 3 p.m. Sunday for London from Yokohama are: Mr. M. P. Malcoln, Mr. W. E. Glaeser, Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Fleming, Mrs. and Miss Maples, Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Ralfs, Dr. and Mrs. Nicolas de Bock, Mr. J. M. Adamo, Master H. Ralfs, Miss A. B. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. William Dibble and Mr. George H. Crane-Williams.

ON BOARD ATSUTA MARU

Among the passengers who sailed from Yokohama on the N.Y.K. liner Atsuta Maru which left for Sidney and Melbourne at 3 p.m. today are: Mr. A. G. Sutherland, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Sanderson, Mrs. Levy, Mr. White, Mr. W. W. Kellogg, Mrs. K. T. Duigan, Mr. C. K. MacDonald, Miss Sanderson, Mr. and Mrs. R. Burnham, Mrs. K. Wilson and Mr. K. Neubert.

TOKYO INTERNATIONAL CLUB MEETING

The Tokyo International Club is holding a party in honor of the Rev. Frank A. Seifert at the American Bakery Hall, 6 Tamachi 7-chome, Akasaka, at 7 p.m. today. The Rev. Seifert, for five years chaplain of State and Military prisons, will speak on Personal Experiences in American Prison Life.

How Europe Keeps Peace In Industry Described

judges, one selected from the employers, one from the workers and the third is a qualified lawyer. These judges are appointed by the trustees of labor.

The trustees are themselves big industrialists, and it is difficult to conceive of their being stanch defenders of the rights of labor. It is as if in the automobile strike in the United States the chairman of the employers concerned had the decision as to what should be done under such conditions with his own workmen.

With no freedom of movement for labor—each worker must have a "labor passport"—with the labor market regimented and with the political pressure under which the whole of Germany's economic system has operated since 1933, the workers could be "kept in their place" with little or no legislation.

ITALY:

As in National Socialist Germany, so in Fascist Italy, Signor Benito Mussolini has done away with the once powerful Socialist Trade Unions and made all strikes and lockouts illegal. The fundamental idea governing the Fascist labor legislation is that the interests of individuals, classes or categories must not prevail over those of the community as a whole, that is, of the State.

The organization of employers and employed are inserted in the framework of the State. They are known as syndicates and receive legal status. They are empowered to act in the matter of labor contracts on behalf of the class and occupation they represent. The contracts they enter into become legally binding not only on their registered member but on all employers or workers engaged in that industry. The syndicates are grouped into federations and confederations, which represent the interests of each category or each industry as a whole.

Special Labor Tribunals

Relations between employers and employed are regulated between the different categories by collective contracts. Conflicts may arise between the said categories, respecting the application of collective contracts or of other existing regulations, or requests for new conditions of labor. These disputes must be settled in a conciliatory manner by the recognized associations of superior grade.

If conciliation fails, the matter goes for final settlement before a special tribunal, called the Magistracy of Labor. This is one of the ordinary Appeal Courts of the kingdom, but the judge is aided by two assessors chosen from a list of experts on the particular matter under dispute. The Magistracy of Labor has hitherto functioned admirable, and the decisions handed down by the Court have been in the majority of cases in favor of the defendants, the workers.

Since 1926, there have been no big strikes and the very few cases which have occurred are said to have been the result of uncertainties prevailing as to the correct interpretation of the Syndicalist Act.

AUSTRIA:

In most of Central and in the whole of southeast Europe laborers are meagerly protected and poorly paid. The main political reason is that the outlawing of Communism makes all effective labor organizations also illegal. The outstanding economic feature of the situation is that the peasantry in this part of the world furnishes an inexhaustible supply of cheap workers. The income of the peasants from the land is so small that they are willing to work in factories for almost nothing. So the city proletariat can expect little more than a bare existence.

In Clerical-Fascist Austria most strikes are illegal. The workers can belong to no organization except the "one state union." Almost all labor agitation is prohibited. In each enterprise the laborers, who belong to the state union, may elect their own representatives, who are under the strictest state control. No independent labor press is allowed and no free expression of opinion is permitted the workers. All free proletarian, cultural, sport, or recreational activity is outlawed.

Collective contracts are often not observed, and rules regulating the hours of work are neglected. Industry is slowly going forward, but wages are going down, the number of unemployed is mounting, and the consumptive power of the masses is steadily sinking.

Obligatory arbitration commissions are part of the Austrian system. But so far they have hardly begun to function. Workers are more or less at the mercy of the State and their employers. They are therefore highly dissatisfied and their lot is so bad that certain members of the Government, as well as distinguished churchmen, have made vigorous protests.

RUMANIA:

In Rumania, where there is not much unemployment, strikes sometimes occur and are occasionally suppressed with great violence. All radical labor organizations are suppressed. Communism is outlawed and anyone agitating in favor of the workers is considered a communist. The standard of living of the workers in very low.

The present dictatorial govenment of Bulgaria has made strikes illegal. There is one state union. Bulgaria's industry is quite limited and more of the regular workers are communists at heart. They once exerted much political influence. Good social laws exists, but are poorly enforced. Unemployment aid is given. Generally speaking the Bulgarians are poor and the workers are very poor along with the rest.

YUGOSLAVIA:

The Yugoslav Government has recently decreed a minimum wage of 45 cents a day. There is a large state labor organization with imposing chamber of labor. Socialist activity is not prohibited but communism is violently persecuted. Industry is growing in Yugoslavia and the number of workers is increasing. Strikes sometimes occur, but with thousands of peasants waiting to take up any tools that might be laid down, strikes are useless. Besides, labor leaders advocating such drastic acts are arrested as communists.

When the potential supply of workens far exceeds the demand, when communism is considered treason, when the masses are ignorant, and the state police is invested with great authority, wages seems to be determined by the bare level of existence.

BELGIUM:

Conciliation is the backbone of the Belgian anti-strike machinery—strengthened by a liberal amount of pressure on the parties to use the machinery provided. An unusual feature is the penalty applicable to employers and workens alike for failing to mediate. If the employers refuse to go to arbitration when the workers are willing, the latter receive unemployment relief. If the other way about, no relief is given by the State. The attempt at stay-in strikes which followed the French ones last June were drastically suppressed by the Van Zeeland Government, which pushed through emergency legislation granting, among other advantages, shorter hours and holidays with pay.

SCANDINAVIA:

In Denmark and the other Scandinavian States, there is a strong belief in the efficacy of the Official Conciliator. This important gentleman may acquire as a preliminary condition of his mediation that for a whole week there shall be no stoppage of work. In Norway, the conciliator can bring the two parties together before the dispute has been aggravated by notice of a strike or lockout. In Sweden, too, conciliation is carried out almost exclusively by official conciliators. In all three countries justifiable questions, such as the interpretation of a collective agreement, are automatically referred to arbitration or labor courts.

In the conscription countries, the Government's most drastic weapon against would-be strikers is to order them to the barracks. This was done recently with success by the Greek dictator, Gen. Jean Metaxas. But when in the first recorded strike in history the Israelites of old were oppressed by the Egyptians, it was not physical force which liberated them.

Soviet-German Trade Goes On As They Bicker

of expiration.

The first of these was an agreement in April, 1935, under which Germany granted to the Soviet five-year credits totaling 200,000,000 marks, the first "bank credit" of the type to be granted to the U. S. S. R. by a foreign country. Orders for 200,000,000 marks of producers' goods in addition to "current orders" were to be placed by the Soviets within a year. Despite the previous extension of the date of expiration, by September 1, 1936, orders totaling only 167,000,000 marks had been placed. The Soviet trade delegation to Berlin charged the time of delivery of German goods had become inordinately long, that the prices were excessive, that German firms declined to export to the U. S. S. R. certain articles freely exported elsewhere, etc.

Germans Denied It

In reply the committee of German business for trade with Russia admitted there had been certain delays, charged the Russians with failure to take over the goods when they were ready, and denied the prices were too high.

Unquestionably there have been serious delays recently in filling the export orders because of sharply increased domestic demand, especially for heavy industrial goods. In this connection the shortage of raw materials plays a role. On the other hand, it appears clear that Soviet purchasers abroad are so exacting in their demands and such insistent bargainers that they are not the easiest in the world to deal with. After much controversy an arrangement was reached in December to further the extension of the expiring date of the credit agreement to March 31, 1937.

Second Pact in 1936

The second of the two primary Soviet-German trade agreements now in operation was signed April 29, 1936. In its major features it is tantamount to a limited clearing agreement. Payments for Soviet products exported to Germany are made into special mark accounts on which the Soviets draw for the purchase of German goods.

When the agreement was signed, Soviet purchases from Germany in 1936 were expected to approach 200,000,000 marks. Since the actual purchases were hardly half that figure, the arrangement, which was to have expired at the end of 1936, was extended an additional year with the provision that mark balances accumulated by the Soviets might be utilized to February, 1938. In general, the obstacles encountered in carrying out the credit agreement referred to above account also for the failure of the second agreement to meet expectations.

Soviet Stronger Now

Although a new credit agreement to replace that expiring on March 31 is not to be ruled out, German credits doubtless will never again play a role in Soviet foreign trade equivalent to that they once played. The strong Soviet gold position today would obviate any such possibility.

As long as the existing government control of the foreign trade of the Reich continues, the Soviets will be able to export to Germany but little more than they are prepared to import from Germany. The fact that fundamentally Germany continues to be the Soviets' most suitable market would seem to indicate that, barring unforeseen developments, substantial trade between the two countries will continue, and there may be moderate increases in its proportions.

Vitamin A Urged By Doctors For Safer Driving

Literary Digest

Solemnly the judge pronounced sentence on the motorist responsible for an after-dark collision: "I find you guilty of vitamin A deficiency and hereby sentence you to three tablespoonfuls of cod-liver oil a day, and plenty of eggs and green vegetables at every meal."

This sentence, as yet handed down in no court of the land, some day may take rank with "thirty days or thirty dollars" as a standard bit of legal therapy for certain types of automobile accidents.

Recently, Dr. Harold Jeghers, Instructor in Internal Medicine at the Boston University School of Medicine, announced the results of a two-year experiment: Many motorists involved in night-time accidents are neither reckless nor incompetent, but are unconsious victims of an avitaminosis. This formidable medical term simply means a vitamin deficiency.

Hapless Hemeralopes

The particular anti-safety vitamin which Doctor Jeghers drags before the bar of justice is vitamin A. Insufficient amounts of this element in the diet produce a form of night blindness known as hemeralopia. Nutritionists have long known of this strange optical by-product of vitamin A deficiency, but it remained for Doctor Jeghers to produce startling figures. Of several hundred persons examined by him, 10 per cent suffered night blindness caused by improper diet. Hemeralopia victims have difficulty in seeing dimly lighted roads at night, and the glare of headlights is greatly intensified for them.

"Night blindness is an early symptom of vitamin A deficiency," says Doctor Jeghers. "This does not mean total blindness, but refers to diminished ability to see when things are dimly lighted."

Movie Gropers

People who have perfect daylight vision may suffer from night blindness when illumination is dim. Going from light into semidarkness, as in a movie theater, the hemeralope is almost completely blind for a brief period until his eyes have adjusted themselves to the darkness. Instead of being able to see dimly, as he should, he is unable to see anything, must grope helplessly for a seat.

No outward physical sign betrays the man with vitamin A deficiency. He usually appears well-nourished. Unaware of his night blindness, he accepts night-driving difficulties as the usual lot of all motorists, becomes an unwitting accident hazard. Vitamin A treatment rapidly restores the night-blind to normal vision. In most cases the vitamin deficiency is traced to improper selection of foods, sickness, or attempts to reduce weight. Convinced that hemeralopia partly explains the high incidence of motor fatalities at night, Doctor Jeghers is continuing his researches in collaboration with Dr. H. R. DeSilva of the Harvard Traffic School.

Potent Family

Hiding behind its alphabetical cloak, vitamin A is a ranking member of a potent clan whose family skeletons have been only partly dragged out of an indefinite number of closets. It is not quite proper to speak of vitamins as a family, for they are extreme individualists and merely share a common responsibility for the dietic weal or wo of the human body. They adopt tantalizing disguises to elude the scientific detective. Out of vitamin A has come vitamin D, and the original vitamin B (now often called the B complex) has been dissected to yield vitamin G and a host of numerical relatives bearing designations from B1 to B6.

Best identified of the vitamins, indispensable to human well-being, are A, B, C, D and G. Vitamin E, sometimes called X, usually described as an antisterility factor, is a late-comer to the fold. Vitamin F has been used in different meanings by different researchers, is no longer widely accepted. Recently a new vitamin named cholin was announced, but little is known of it. Investigators generally agree that new vitamins will be isolated, but that they probably will prove to be subdivisions of present vitamins.

Beriberi

Within the last decade, vitamins have muscled their way in to a dominating place at the dietitian's table, have largely routed calory counting as a diet fad. In the early years of the century, proteins, fats, carbohydrates, mineral matter and water were regarded as embracing all the elements for a well-rounded diet.

But as long ago as 1883, one of the vitamins emerged into scientific company, saw that it was unrecognized, and slunk back into limbo. In that year Takaki, a medical officer of the Japanese Navy, remarked that sailors sent on long cruises often returned suffering from beriberi, a nervous disease. Takaki knew that the principal item of diet on Japanese men-of-war was polished rice. Could this stapled food have anything to do with beriberi? There was one way to answer the question: Takaki arranged a more rounded diet for a crew about to go on an extended trip. When they returned, not a man had suffered from the disease except a few who had stubbornly maintained their right to eat polished rice and nothing else.

Actually, Takaki had stumbled on the trail of vitamin B (or B1), the element which prevents the nutritional deficiency disease of beriberi. But no one recognized it at the time. It was not until several years later that investigators, feeding laboratory animals under controlled experiments, discovered that various foods possessed mysterious "accessory factors" necessary for growth and the cure or prevention of beriberi and scurvy. The name vitamins was given to these unknown substances in 1912 by a Polish physician, Dr. Casimir Funk.

Source

From the ability of vitamins to prevent or cure deficiency disease springs the common custom of identifying them as being anti-this or that. Thus vitamin A is the anti-infection vitamin, C the anti-neuritic, etc. The best source of vitamins is proper food, with one exception: an adequate requirement of vitamin D is apparently not met by any commonly used food.

Vitamin D is perhaps the most fascinating and temperamental of the whole clan. It is particularly important to growing children, preventing rickets. Until 1922 its identity was linked with vitamin A. In 1924 it was discovered that it can be produced by the irradiation of proper substances by ultraviolet light. Sunlight acts upon a substance in the skin called ergosterol to produce vitamin D, bestowing science's blessing on the vogue for suntanning. It is stored in the body, particularly in the liver; hence fish-liver oils (cod and halibut) are among the richest sources.

Success Story

Within the past two years, vitamin D has outstripped all its brethren commercially. (Vitamin A, also contained in cod-liver oil, is an able partner in many vitamin D enterprises.) D-vitaminized bread and milk, and even breakfast food, have won a wide market. It gets into the products by irradiation or the addition of vitamin D concentrate; by either method, it is the same antirachitic vitamin. Milk is irradiated by being flowed in a thin stream beneath ultraviolet lamps. In the winter, natural cow's milk contains no vitamin D; in the summer, there is a negligible content. Ordinary irradiated milk contains one-third the D content of fortified vitamin D milk, the type to which concentrate is added. The D content of ordinary cow's milk can be increased by feeding cod-liver oil to the animal. Practically all the vitamin potency of irradiated milk resides in the cream.

Minimum human vitamin requirements are established as the least amount required to prevent deficiency diseases. Minimum requirements, in most cases, are far below the desirable intake. To maintain minimum quantity of vitamin A is necessary. It is practically impossible to overvitaminize the body; in general, the more vitamins, the more health. Not so with tricky vitamin D, however. It is the one vitamin in which overdosage is possible (though extremely improbable.) Too much of it causes nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, headaches, hazy memory, other toxic symptoms.

Noted Flying Couple Is Seeking Divorce

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, March 13—Despite a statement made in Paris earlier today regarding rumors of her impending divorce in which she declared, "I can't imagine why this issue has been started up again," it was reliably learned here this evening that Mrs. Amy Johnson Mollison had asked her representative here to issue a statement on her behalf saying that it was true that she was seeking a divorce from Major James A. Mollison.

Upon being interviewed, Mrs. Mollison's representative stated that she has "lots of plans for long distance flights and record attempts for the future, but she will make these as Miss Johnson."

Headed For Divorce Court

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, March 13—Explaining in an interview that whereas his wife's interests lay in France where she is planning a new air company, his lay in America and England, Major James A. Mollison, famed British aviator, announced here today that he had asked his wife, the former Amy Johnson to divorce him.

Aviation circles here expressed great surprise and regret at the announcement and recalled that Major and Mrs. Mollison were among the world's premier flying couples.

Confirming that he and his wife will be rivals in the forthcoming New York-to-Paris air race in August, Major Mollison declared, "I hope to win, but would be more than delighted if Amy gets there first."

Seymour Chosen Yale President

pansion. During his regime the university's endowment fund rose from $20,662,000 to $99,993,000 and the value of its physical plant from $35,000,000 to about $100,000,00. He came to Yale from the Carnegie Corporation, of which he was president in 1920-'21.

When Dr. Seymour takes office, the so-called "big three" universities of the East all will have comparatively new heads. Harvard and Princeton came under new presidents in 1933. At Harvard Dr. Conant, then only forty, succeeded Dr. A Lawrence Lowell, retired, as president and at Princeton Dr. Harold Willis Dodds, then forty-four, succeeded Dr. John Grief Hibben, fatally injured in an automobile accident.

Members of Yale Corporation with the power to vote are Dr. Angell; Governor Cross; T. Frank Hayes, Lieutenant Governor, also a member ex-officio; Howwell Cheney, of South Manchester, Conn.; Francis Parsons, of Hartford, Conn.; Mortimer Norton Buckner, of New Cork City; Dr. Coffin, of New York City; Dr. Fred Towley Murphy, of Detroit; Edward Beldon Greene, Cleveland; Thomas Walter Swan, of New York City; James Lee Loomis, of Granby, Conn.; Reeve Schley, of Far Hills, N. J.; Thomas Day Thacher, of New York City; the Rev. Dr. Arthur Howe Bradford, of Province, R. I.; Edwand Larned Ryerson jr., of Chicago; Robert Alphonso Taft, of Cincinnati; the Right Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, of Boston, and Frederick Trubee Davidson, of Locust Valley, L. I.

Those who sit with the corporation but do not vote, include Dr. Seymour, in his present office as provost; Carl Albert Lohmann, Yale secretary; George Parmly Day, university treasurer, and Thomas Wells Farnam, associate treasurer and comptroller.

Preceding the formal meeting of the Yale Corporation, its members appeared frequently at the upper windows of Woodbridge Hall and glanced downward at the parading theological students. The picketing continued from 9 to 11 a.m. Neither campus nor city police attempted to interfere. A group of students gathered on a walk opposite the demonstrators, shouting sympathy or disapproval, according to their inclinations.

The picket line was organized by the "strategy committee in defense of Jerome Davis," which is headed by Roy J. McCorkle, of Pittsburgh. He explained that students interested in Dr. Davis's case had sent numerous protests to the Yale Corporation, but that all but one had been ignored. That one, he said, had been acknowledged "quite curtly."

"As students," said Mr. McCorkle, "we are interested in the future relationship of the Divinity School to the Yale Corporation. Will the Divinity School faculty be permitted to make decisions on the scholastic policy? That is the question.'

"In our estimation, as students for the ministry of Christian service, Jerome Davis is one of our most stimulating and valuable professors. He is being let out of the Divinity School for reasons we question. The corporation's action in this matter has been contrary to the wishes of our faculty and student body, so that we consequently believe that the issues involved in this case indicate that the corporation's actions definitely menace the principles of academic freedom."

Dr. Davis has been associate professor of practical philanthropy at Yale. The reason given by the university for his dismissal have been the budgetary situation, which made it neccesary to drop several teachers, the allegation that Dr. Davis did not measure up to university standards of scholarship and teaching, and the charge that Dr. Davis's outside activities interfered with his teaching.

Japanese Deny Merchant Ships Get Big Subsidy

Replying to recent attacks by leading British shipowners against Japan's shipping policies, M. Saito, European, representative of the Nippon Shipowners Association, flatly denies that his country's merchant marine has been overbuilt with the aid of liberal subsidies and insists that the nation actually is short of tonnage to handle her expanding ocean-going commerce.

Mr. Saito's views, which are contained in a letter to "The London Times," presents Japan's side of the international shipping question for the first time in many years, and is bound to be of interest to American operators, as the British critics of Japan's policies have been equally severe in their condemnation of the merchant marine program of the United States, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The letter, a copy of which was received here recently, in part, follows: "It is true that Japan now has a merchant marine of a little more than 4,000,000 tons, compared with 1,700,000 tons in 1914, but it is also a fact that her foreign trade has increased from 1,200,000,000 yen in 1914 to 5,200,000,000 yen in 1935. So if national tonnage ought to increase in proportion to the increase in national foreign trade Japan should possess a merchant fleet of 7,380,000 tons.

'Suffers Tonnage Shortage'

"The theoretical argument aside, however, the fact is that Japan does not possess a surfeit of tonnage, but the converse is the actual state of affairs. Though her shipping has developed considerably as the natural corollary to the great economic expansion during the last forty years. Japan in reality still is suffering from an acute shortage of tonnage, as is amply borne out by the fact that she has been obliged to charter foreign ships to meet her requirements.

"It is apparent that few people realize the volume of Japanese foreign trade today, and that as much as 35,000,000 tons of cargo moves in and out of Japan each year, and that the sea-borne traffic of Manchoukuo and China amounts to 25,000,000 tons per annum.

"Another factor which should be taken into account when considering the amount of tonnage necessary to carry each country's overseas trade is the geographical situation of each country in relation to the sources of supply of raw materials. Unfortunately, Japan is situated a long way from the principal countries exporting raw materials, so naturally much more tonnage is required to carry the same quantity of cargo to and from Japan than between countries in Europe.

Denies Huge Subsidies

"Now as regards subsidies, it would appear that most people in this country have the impression that Japan is maintaining an excessively large merchant fleet by means of extravagant government subsidies. This is entirely erroneous; the total subsidy paid to shipping by the Japanese government during 1936 amounted to nearly 11,000,000 yen. This consists of 1,500,000 yen for scrapping and building scheme and 8,700,000 yen for the maintenance of regular mail services and 720,000 yen for mail contracts.

"The budget proposals for 1937, however, indicate somewhat higher figures—namely, 2,800,000 yen for building tonnage, 11,700,000 yen for the maintenance of mail services and for mail contracts, and 1,800,000 yen subsidy for cargo ships, making a total of 16,300,000 yen."

Mr. Saito characterized as a "gross exaggeration" the charge that the shipowners in Japan are receiving subsidies representing a quarter of the construction cost. "The Japanese shipbuilding subsidy," he said, "was introduced in 1934, when there was much discussion over the redundancy of world tonnage and rationalization schemes were being considered.

Started a Scrapping Scheme

"At that time Japan took the initiative, and with a view to reducing her tonnage a scrapping and building scheme was instituted, providing for the breaking up of 400,000 tons of shipping and the building of 200,000 tons of new shipping during 1935, the government taking the opportunity to encourage the building of fast vessels for emergency purposes by granting a subsidy of 45 yen a ton, representing 10 per cent of the construction cost for each new vessel built under the scheme.

"The subsidies for the maintenance of mail services are mostly confined to a few routes which are considered vital to the national well-being, namely, Japan to North and South America, to Manchoukuo and to China, etc., where vessels of high speed maintain services with clock-like regularity. Many other regular services are operated with either negligible subsidies or none at all; for example, for the regular fortnightly mail service between Japan and Europe, operated by the N. Y. K. Line, the very moderate subsidy of 550,000 yen is paid annually in lieu of payment for the carriage of mails, which, compared to the mail money the British mail lines are receiving from the British government for similar services, is negligible."

Congress Acts On Batista Bills To Save Its Life

HAVANA, Feb. 10—Warned by the military thrust that last week toppled Speaker Carlos Marquez Sterling and raised a friend of the Army to leadership of the House of Representatives, leaders of Congress are working nights to hasten passage of important social and economic measures, lest further delay result in the dissolution of both legislative bodies by Colonel Fulgencio Batista, Cuban army chief.

Should Congress fail to keep pace with the energetic former sergeant, there appeals little likelihood that it will survive long, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune. Current reports say that Batista would dissolve it summarily and install a new form of government to accomplish the legislative functions of the Administration, headed nominally by President Federico Laredo Bru.

Army Bills To Be Pushed

Succeeding Sterling as Speaker of the House, Antonio Martinez Fraga, intimate friend of the army chief, hopes to accelerate the approval of at least thirty of the 217 bills now clogging the legislative channels, he announced, revealing that most of these measures were in keeping with the military's nationalist program.

Representative Fraga, prosecutor in the impeachment trial of President Miguel Mariano Gomez December 24, said the bills pending Congressional action were of immeasurable importance. He said two of the measures would hit public service companies owned by North Americans.

He referred to bills introduced by Representative Carlos Palma, former judge advocate of the Army, who has been striving for many months to force a Congressional investigation of the Cuban Power Company (a subsidiary of the Electrical Bond and Share Company) and the Cuban Telephone Company operated by the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, on allegations that the rates in Cuba are exorbitant.

Merchant Marine Sought

Fraga, brother of Pedro Martines Fraga, newly appointed Cuban ambassador to the United States, also said Congressmen were studying legislation providing for Cuba's first national merchant marine fleet, which would obviously offer competition to American steamship companies operating here.

According to the plans, the fleet would be acquired and operated by the government to promote the tourist industry. Juan J. Remos, Secretary of War, who is backing the project, said that arrangements with an American steamship company for sufficient vessels to maintain regular schedule between Havana and Miami were under consideration.

Valencia Protests To Whitehall Entry Of Italian Troops

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, March 13.—Describing the wholesale dispatch of Italian volunteers to Spain as a "veritable military expedition," Spanish ambassador Pablo de Azcarate today handed to Whitehall officials a formal note from the Valencia Government appealing to Britain to use her influence in stopping such foreign interference in the current Spanish war.

The note points out that the solution to the problem "cannot be found in the application of a control system, however perfect that system may be." It adds that any solution "requires the direct collaboration of all countries" which must undertake in a spirit of "honor and responsibility" to carry out the principles of contemporary international law.

The first part of Spain's note to Britain, drafted in identical terms as the note dispatched by Valencia to the League and League members, reports the declarations made by Italian prisoners captured on Spanish fronts, according to which four fully equipped and mechanized Italian divisions are operating at the present time on the Guadalajara front. This army, it is stated, is headed by General Managini.

In the second part of the note, addressed especially to Britain, the Spanish Government requests London to use her influence with the non-intervention committee to commence immediate discussion of Spain's allegations. It further appeals for an immediate decision "regarding the real character of the military collaboration being offered by the Italian Government toward the rebels."

Pravda Assails Optimism Over Sato's Speech

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

MOSCOW, March 12—Utterly failing to share the favorable impression created in other countries by Foreign Minister Naotake Sato's declaration before the Japanese Diet, Pravda today assailed "premature optimism" regarding a change in Tokyo's foreign policy and said that concrete proof of a more conciliatory attitude must be given by Japan's actions during the next few months.

The Hayashi cabinet, Pravda alleged, was formed "under the threat of a military Fascist coup d'etat", and in the foreign sphere, its principal task is to strengthen and extend the Japanese-German anti-Communist alliance. The Diet debate, asserted the paper, failed to extract the full truth concerning this alliance from the Government.

Pravda especially criticized the Government's attribution of strained Japanese-Soviet relations to a lack of sincerity on the part of Moscow. "Elementary truthfulness," the paper asserted, would have required admission that the real obstacle to co-operation is the pact with Germany.

The latter, Pravda claimed, prevents notably the conclusion of a non-aggression pact between Japan and Soviet Russia, the need of which was cited by speakers who interpellated the Government during the recent debates. The paper pointed to these interpellations as a sign that widespread concern still prevails in Japan regarding relations with the Soviet.

Denying that Foreign Minister Sato's statements inspire optimism, Pravda declared that he still "has to reckon with the decisive influence of the militarists" and finds his hands tied by the agreement with Germany. It is doubtful moreover whether he can succeed in bettering relations with England, while the future of Japanese relations with China likewise remains uncertain.

EAST CONFERENCE OF THE JAPAN METHODIST CHURCH

Monday evening in a church near the Ginza, a little after nine a man on a platform began to read a list of places and names. A large gathering of men and women listened intently; many of them copied down the announcements, for the destiny of several men and their families for a year, or maybe a lifetime, was being decided. The man on the platform was Bishop Kugimiya presiding at the 30th annual meeting of the East Conference of the Japan Methodist Church, and he was transacting the last piece of official business before the council closed, reading the list of appointments to churches. Some men to cold Karafuto, others to receive churches in Tokyo, the center of empire, the capital of the East—small wonder that there was keen interest in the announcements.

Methodism in Japan, is nearer 80 than 30 years old, but the present church, a union of three separate groups in Japan dates its history from 1907. Bishop Kugimiya, officiating at his first annual conference in Tokyo, showed remarkable skill in filling a difficult and intricates position, and won the approval and enthusiasms of all members. The late Bishop Akazawa, and the Rev. Dr. Soper, the veteran missionary to Japan who died recently in United States, were remembered, together with other ministers of the church who died during the year, at an impressive memorial service Saturday. Bishop Baker of California addressed the conference Friday; among other points he mentioned the forthcoming union of Methodist bodies in United States, and the ecumenical conference on Life and Order to be held in Oxford during the summer of 1938.

Ecclesiastical gatherings may be depressing, but there was a note of optimism in the conference, with plenty of evidence that there was not only faith, but substance in the church. Though only a few years old, the Laymen's Association has, during the past year, raised ¥30,200, one-half of the budget of the Board of Evangelism, which is used for the extension of the church. There was considerable reference to the forward movement of the church, organized to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the famous date in 1738, when John Wesley's heart was "strangely warmed" in the little chapel in Aldersgate. Eight candidates were ordained elders, that is full ministers, one, a deacon, and, a tradition-breaking step, one woman, Miss S. Mano, was ordained to be the first "deacon" in the church. There was a feeling at the meeting that not only was the Japan Methodist Church thoroughly indigenous, but that it was interpreting traditional Christianity faithfully in Japan.

Anniversary Program At The Tokyo Theater

scholar of French literature and philosophy and champion of advanced views of freedom and emancipation of the people and their rights. The title role of Nakaye is taken by Ryutaro Tatsumi, while the part of Nakaye's mother is played by Kise-ko Hisamatsu. This play consists of 3 acts and 6 scenes. In the play, the true nature and character of the noted democratic leaders of the Meiji is brought into strong relief and entice the audience into that characteristic social and political atmosphere of that special Era which is regarded by political students as very interesting and colorful.

The second piece is "Soonji-no-Adauchi" (Revenge at Soonji Temple). The chronological background of this play is Bunka corresponding to 1804, when bushido, Japanese feudal chivalry, was still playing a full and potent part in the upper strata of society. The circumstances under which the vendetta was committed brings to one's mind a vivid mental picture of the social condition and moral phase of those old days. The principal roles are taken by such leading actors as Saburo Marumo, Masao Akizuki, Seigo Shimada and Toranosuke Ogawa.

The third number of the program is "Botchan", a masterpiece by Soseki Natsume, noted novelist and writer of the Meiji Era. This play is well adapted from the above novel which is very popular as a representative humorous story of the Meiji Era written in a very pithy and suggestive style. The representative characters of the story are so popular that the names of these characters are used to indicate such and such persons of this, that or other type. The principal actors include Seiichiro Nomura, Kinnosuke Kanai, Seigo Shimada and Toranosuke Ogawa and Kinnosuke Kanai.

Johnny Weissmuller In New Tarzan Story

Crashing through breath-taking adventures in the jungles, Tarzan and his mate, as enacted by Johnny Weissmuller and Maureen O'Sullivan, bring to the Imperial Theater Thursday another breath-taking adventure romance.

This is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Tarzan Escapes," packed with thrills, telling the story of a human deceit directed against a primitive man of the jungle, and of the treachery of civilized man against the jungle friend of wild beasts who has never known the tricks of his "enlightened" brothers.

"Tarzan Escapes" takes the Edgar Rice Burroughs character into the country of giant vampire bats; its thrills include a battle between an army of elephants and savage warriors, the routing of lions by an elephant stampede; a dash through a crocodile-infested river, and other exciting details surrounding the primitive love story of the series.

In the new story Tarzan is betrayed and captured by the man who pretends friendship and who plans to exhibit him as a wild man. His faithful mate, played by Miss O'Sullivan, and his jungle friends aid in a sensational escape.

Weissmuller as Tarzan swings across wild gorges, on strange vine bridges, and swims perilous rivers. Miss O'Sullivan is her charming character as in former Tarzan pictures, and Benita Hume, British actress, plays the heroine's sister. John Buckler enacts the animal collector. William Henry plays Miss O'Sullivan's cousin, who remains loyal.

Richard Thorpe directed the new picture with deft skill. Remarkable photography adds to the effectiveness of its stirring action, and some gorgeous scenic details add beauty to the adventure and romance of the story.

A Striking Program By Seinen-Kabuki

On the occasion of the 5th anniversary of the organization of the Seinen-Kabuki Troupe, a special program is being performed on the stage of the Meijiza Theater, Hamacho, Nihonbashi, Tokyo during this month. The program consists of the "Nihon Matsu Buke Monogatari" (A feudal tale of a samurai family at Nihon Matsu) a play written by Shin Hasegawa, noted popular writer; "Omi Genji Senjin Yakata" a famous kabuki play, "Shimpan Uta Saimon", "Yuki-No-Yo Iriya Azemichi" and "Michiyuki Hatsune Tabi" also popular kabuki plays.

These performances are being played by the leading young kabuki actors including Gado, Kanya, Yagoro, Sosho, Takazo, Komagoro, Kimiya, Sasho, Tsuruzo, Fukusuke, Shiyu, Senjaku, Taro, Shuya, Komasuke, Tosho, and several others.

The program of this month is particularly striking commemorating the 5th anniversary of the establishment of the troupe, also performances are also being shown with much of activities and perfectness. The first piece of the program is the most interesting for the audience of the troupe, because it is mostly suitable play to the young kabuki actors.

The others, which are well known among the theater goers as the popular kabuki plays, are little rearranged for the troupe. The last piece is a beautiful kabuki dance, which is performed with a musical accompaniment of Kiyomoto music. The roles of this dance are being taken by Kanya, Takasuke, Yayenosuke, Tosho and several others.

Promotion For "Buddy"

C. C. "Buddy" Coleman, Frank popular assistant director on "Lost Horizon" and all of his other important hits of the last seven years, has finished work on his second picture as a full fledged director under his new contract with Columbia. "Buddy" directed "Cross Fire", a western picture starring Charles Starrett, just completed work on "Legion of Terror", a story of the United States Postal inspectors. Bruce Cabot and Marguerite Churchill are featured and Crawford Weaver, new Columbia dramatic find, got his first screen role in the picture.

Trick

"Com-pa-nee, atten-shun!" bawled the drill sergeant to the awkward squad. "Com-pa-nee, life up your left leg and hold it straight in front of you!"

By mistake, one rookie held up his right leg, which brought it out side by side with his neighbor's left leg.

"Aw right, aw right; who's the wise guy over there holding up both legs?" shouted the hard-boiled sergeant.—The Watchword.

Whee!

A man rushed out of a house, across the pavement, jumped high in the air and fell in the gutter heavily.

A passer-by rushed to his assistance, lifted him up and said: "You did a very funny thing jjust then."

"Yes," replied the other, "I thought I'd left my bicycle outside."—Montreal Star.

British Banker Has a Confident View of Future

Christian Science Monitor

LONDON,—Informed opinion that the present upward movement of trade has still far to go and that an undue speculation associated with it can now be curbed successfully without damage to legitimate business, is held by no less an authority than Mr. Reginald McKenna, one of Britain's most distinguished economists.

Presiding at this year's annual general meeting of the Midland Bank, the biggest of Britain's "big-five" banking institutions, Mr. McKenna said he took "a confident view of the future." He also said "the expansion of world trade has already proceeded further than seemed likely a year ago, and promises to go further still if peace is maintained." Mr. McKenna stated that with wise handling of the monetary system "we need not fear a return of the stringency to which our business life was formally subjected."

Regarding the danger of inflationary speculation necessarily inherent in any period of improving trade such as the present, Mr. McKenna expressed the view that the banks are now able to prevent mischief arising.

Rise in Bank Rate

"When we were on the gold standard," he said, "the recognized check to boom conditions, whatever their cause, was a rise in the bank rate and a contraction of credit. Boom conditions weakened the exchange value of sterling, and the statutory duty to maintain gold parity forced the Bank of England to adopt restrictive measures. The remedy certainly achieved its object, but at the same time it seldom failed to do much more than the occasion required. It fell with like effect on all trade and industry and on all markets, whether speculative or not, and by forcing down prices far more quickly than costs tended to produce a condition of business stagnation. Such procedure was unavoidable when we were living under the obligations of the gold standard, but is it necessarily the right procedure now that we are free from them?

"In answering this question two general considerations are reassuring. First, there is much wider perception of the dangers which may arise, and much better understanding of their nature than have existed hitherto. Harsh experience has driven home its lessons.

"And secondly, we have now a highly co-ordinated monetary system. The few great commercial banks work in harmony with the central bank, and all, in matters affecting trade and industry as a whole, act under such general directions as the Treasury may find it advisable to give. We are no longer subjected to the blind force of gold movements; we have an instrument of immense power working as occasion requires under a single direction. With these things in our favor it ought not to be beyond the wit of man to find the appropriate safeguard against each danger as it arises, without forcing our industry back once more into stagnation.

Remedy Seen with Banks

"Consider first the risk of excessive speculation. I do not wish to be dogmatic on the subject, but it seems to me that the remedy lies with the banks. They have the power, acting together on an agreed basis, to place a curb upon speculation by directly restricting the quantity of credit used for that purpose. Genuine business would not be affected; there would still be cheap money and abundance of credit for legitimate trade, but there would be no easy money for the mere speculator. I repeat, there are no sufficient indications at present of dangerous speculation, but should this appear a powerful remedy could be provided by the concerted and direct action of the banks without recourse to high rates and indiscriminate restriction of credit.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Russians Vision Airport on Pole For US Route

MOSCOW, Feb. 20.—Crack Soviet aviators think it possible to land at the North Pole and are discussing how to do it. Establishment of a polar aviation base is a prerequisite to inauguration of the Moscow-San Francisco air route across the pole, which the Soviet flyers hope to have in operation in a few years.

Since the 1935 failure of a projected non-stop flight, however, it is now agreed the line cannot be started until an observation and emergency landing base is established in the vicinity of the pole itself.

This base would establish weather conditions and report them by radio so that the direct flight across the pole would be made only when atmospheric conditions were fit.

Parachutists First

The crack pilots Valery Tchkalov, Vasily Sergeyevich Molokov and Alexander Alexeiv recently agreed it would be possible by air to establish a polar base, first landing men by parachutes who would in turn prepare a field for the landing of airplanes.

These men have flown all over the polar regions for years. Tchkalov was the chief pilot on the record long-distance flight of the Ant-25 in 1936 far up into the Arctic and then on to the Pacific.

Molokov was the chief hero of the Chelyuskin rescue expedition of 1935 and has flown 50,000 miles in the Arctic. Alexeiv has been flying there since 1931.

Mavriky Slepnev, widely known author, recently wrote what he called a "fantastic" story of the establishment by air of a North Pole base. The three pilots challenged his description of this feat as fantastic and said it was wholly feasible.

LEAVE FOR CHINA

The Mexican Minister, General F. J. Aguilar, accompanied by his wife, son and daughter and Mrs. Boysen, left Kobe Wednesday for China where he will present his credentials as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. L600,000,000 to Go To Britain's Navy

By HECTOR C. BYWATER

LONDON, Feb. 18.—Of the £1,509,000,000 which Great Britain believes she will have to spend on armaments during the next five years, at least £600,000,000 will be devoted to strengthening the navy and improving its strategic bases at home and overseas.

In none of the many discussions in Parliament on naval policy has any official indication been given of the standard of armed strength at sea which the government aims to achieve, although in former days British naval construction always was governed by a definite policy frankly declared to the world.

Down to the Entente Cordiale reached with France in 1904, Britain maintained a "two-power navy," that is, a navy not inferior to the combined strength of the fleets possessed by the two powers regarded as potential enemies of the first rank. Until the early years of this century, that position was jointly occupied by France and Russia, who were in close alliance.

Another Formula Evolved

But when the naval ambitions of Kaiser Wilhelm II began to assume menacing dimensions, British interest was transferred to the German fleet, and in place of the old two-power yardstick a new formula was evolved.

From 1905 to the outbreak of the World War the relative strength of the British Navy, as against the German fleet, oscillated between a superiority of 60 and 100 per cent. In some years the British building program was drafted on a "two-keel-to-one" basis; in others, a lower standard of relative power was accepted.

At the end of the World War the international naval position has changed so radically that old formulas became meaningless. But in 1920-1921 the big naval programs of the United States and Japan compelled Britain to adopt a rough-and-ready standard of sea strength which was, broadly speaking, parity with the largest foreign navy, namely, that of the United States."

This standard was accepted not because the United States was viewed as a prospective enemy but because it insured Britain of an adequate margin of strength over any other foreign naval power, including Japan. After 1921 all uncertainty as to relative strength was dispelled by the Washington Treaty with its 5—5—3 ratio, to which, up to now, Britain has adhered.

But in recent years the naval outlook has again altered so completely that it would have been quite impossible for Britain to keep to this ratio without imperiling her existence.

Sensational Developments

Although the situation in the Pacific might be unchanged, there had been sensational developments in Europe, almost at Britain's doorstep, so to speak. France and Italy had both built entirely new fleets, each of which was actually superior to the British Navy in fast, light surface vessels and submarines.

Then came Germany's vigorous rearmament at sea, paralleled by the creation of a Soviet fleet that from all accounts is really formidable.

Matters were brought to a head by the Mediterranean crisis of 1935-1936, when for a time it looked as if Britain might have to fight single-handed in defense of her important interests in that sea. The British people were shocked to learn that to meet the challenge of Italy it had been necessary to concentrate four-fifths of the navy in the Mediterranean, leaving other vital areas, notably the Far East, virtually unguarded.

It was this revelation, coupled with saber-rattlnig in Italy, Germany and Japan, that forced the British Government to embark on the mightiest armament program ever launched by this country in time of peace.

Despite the absence of an official declaration, Britain's future standard of relative naval strength seems clearly indicated. It postulates maintenance on something like the two-power standard in European waters, based for the time being on the combined power of the German and Italian fleets, and restoration of British strength in the Pacific, where the advent of a strong battleship force, probably stationed at Singapore, appears to be only a question of time.

In other words, Britain proposes not only to make herself mistress of the narrow seas—comprising the North Sea, the English Channel and the Eastern Atlantic—and to render her Mediterranean corridor less vulnerable than ever before, but also to create an entirely new fleet for eventual service in the Pacific.

Still Firm for League

Recent events have convinced her that this is the minimum standard of naval strength consistent with the safety of the Empire and with the fulfilment of her obligations to the League of Nations, of which she unquestionably remains a staunch adherent.

No concern is felt about the American reaction to this great program. If, as is fully expected, the United States decides to match the new British Navy ton for ton, the decision will be acclaimed rather than criticized here.

It has long been recognized that a strong American Navy is a potent war deterrent, especially in the Pacific. Conversely, it is believed that the patent weakness of Britain in the Far East since the World War has directly encouraged Japanese imperialism.

Battleships will form the backbone of the British program. Probably no fewer than ten of these ships will be built, raising the dreadnought force to twenty-five units. A few years hence, the navy will have airplane carriers embracing almost 500 planes; sixty modern and ten over-age cruisers and about 200 destroyers, the majority modern. The submarine fleet is also to be developed. The navy's personnel, now numbering 101,000 officers and men, may grow to 120,000.

Side by side with this expansion in material and man power, all the more important naval bases at home and abroad are to be modernized and rearmed, thus guaranteeing almost world-wide mobility to Britain's new fleet. Finally, huge reserves of naval munitions of all types, but particularly anti-aircraft equipment, are to be accumulated.

Japanese Wins US Magazine's Photo Contest

is a small figure of a wading fisherman, his arm outstretched as if at the end of a cast. A white fog hovers over the background, shrouding the hills. The difficult lighting conditions under which the photographer made the picture weighed considerably in the judging.

Messrs. Finley, Hunt and Russell were unanimous in their praise of the Akabane entry, declaring it to be the kind of picture one could place in his home and "never tire of."

Picture to "Live With"

"Its essential value is that it is a picture a man can live with," commented Mr. Hunt. "The view is so true to the living quality of the early morning on a trout stream that you can almost feel the early dew. The balance of its composition, the lovely atmospheric qualities, the ideal character of the trout stream and even the smallness of the angler's figure, emphasizing man's unimportance in the face of nature's magnitude, combine to make it truly distinctive."

Nineteen cities and towns in ten States are represented among the fifty-one cash prize winners. The States are New York, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, New Jersey, Maine, Florida, Missouri, California, Connecticut and Indiana. The original entry list of more than 2,500 came from 700 individuals in thirty States.

Contest authorities are writing to the cash prize winners who live within reach of the city, asking them if they can attend the presentation ceremony at Grand Central Palace at 3 P. M. Saturday. Those unable to make the trip here will receive checks from the National Sportsmen's Show by mail. The presentation of the awards in the Wood, Field and Stream Snapshot Contest salon at the show will be made by Sir Hubert Wilkins, British explorer.

Early last night, after a laborious day spent in his office in the Empire State Building, where he acts as technical adviser in this country for the Nakajima Aircraft Company of Tokyo, Seiichi Akabane was informed that he had won the snapshot contest.

Although obviously happy, Akabane, who is 37 years old, revealed that winning amateur camera contests was no new experience.

When only 16 years, while attending school in his native Tokyo, Mr. Akabane was victorious in a snapshot contest for students. A rare study, taken against the light, of a Japanese farmer, gave him his first taste of contest winning.

In 1920, while attending Cascadilla School in Ithaca, where he prepared for Cornell, Mr. Akabane took first prize in a contest for members of the school. The snapshot that brought him the award was flashed in Rome, while on a Summer vacation trip with his father. It was a scene of an Italian garden, taken through an archway.

In July, 1934, Mr. Akabane, while on one of his frequent trout-fishing trips to picturesque Willowemoc Creek in Livingston Manor, Sullivan County, N. Y., took the picture that won the Wide World Photos-National Sportsmen's Show contest.

"I was staying at De Bruce Inn at the time," Akabane said, as he recalled the enjoyable moments of the day when the picture was made. 'It was foggy and about 7 o'clock when I started along the stream in search of trout.

'I was suddenly impressed with the beauty of a secluded spot where a fisherman was casting. It was an unusual scene, with the fog appearing like smoke, and the sun behind it making queer gestures to get through.

"Having my small, Zeiss-Ikon type vest-pocket camera along, as is my custom while fishing or hunting, I took three shots, all of which turned out well."

British Pushing Labor Reform

Christian Science Monitor

LONDON, Feb. 16.—The Government's long-awaited factories bill has received its second reading unopposed, all parties agreeing with its object, which is to reduce unduly long working hours and otherwise to improve the general conditions of labor throughout the entire industrial population of Great Britain.

These differences have resolved themselves mainly into the question of the extent to which it is possible to enforce standards that shall not unduly interfere with the give-and-take essential to accord with the varying circumstances of trade. The Government has endeavored to meet this by prescribing for general adoption conditions which enlightened employers have found it possible to adopt in the interests of their workers, at the same time providing machinery for a more-or-less limited measure of exemption where exceptional circumstances exist.

Labor's Charges

The Cabinet has thus laid itself open to charges which were strongly pressed in the debate by Labor opposition. These charges emphasized that there have been left loopholes whereby unscrupulous employers, whose factory arrangements and hours of working are especially in need of reform, may be able to evade the provisions intended to be enforced. This applies particularly to the reduction which the measure provides in the working hours for women and young children.

It was pointed out by Government speakers, however, that it may be in the interests not only of the employers but also of the workers to move cautitously in such matters at first. This is in order not to interfere with enterprises the cessation of which might seriously increase unemployment.

The difficulty of passing a long and necessarily contentious measure of the kind through its remaining stages in Parliament is also expected to be so considerable as to suggest the desirability of easing the task as far as possible.

Lengthy Matter

Even as it is, the measure is expected to make a demand so heavy upon parliamentary time as to render it a matter of much difficulty to get it passed. It contains no less than 152 clauses, many of them containing numerous subclauses, all of which may be disputed. It is pointed out, therefore, that to aim at anything more than the universalization of the existing practices of to better-run factories and workshops, might be indefinitely to postpone the very real improvements for which the measure provides. As these improvements affect for the better the working conditions of 5,500,000 workers this consideration is regarded as highly important.

The bill makes a number of very real reforms. It substitutes a 48-hour week in the cases of women and young persons under 18, who may now be employed in some cases for 60 hours and in others for 55½ hours. There is permissive overtime, but this is strictly limited. The maximum overtime is generally to be six hours in any one week, while the number of weeks in the year in which overtime may be worked is not to be more than 30. Permission to exceed these limits is to require express Government authority. In seasonal trades where the limit of overtime for women may be raised to a maximum of 10 hours in the year, such extension is to be limited to cases similarly approved by the permanent officials.

Government's Visa

Another valuable change effected by the measure is to require young persons under 16 years of age who enter a factory to be certified by a government inspector as physically fit for the work they are to do.

A feature of the measure is that it removes existing anomalies under which at present a workshop, a ship or a building under construction may be liable to escape regulation, although this would not be the case if the same operations were being carried on in a place classed as a factory. Lighting arrangements for workers are also to come under supervision, it having been found that existing artificial illumination is often defective. Numerous provisions in the laws already in force, including ones for ensuring cleanliness, suitable temperature in workshops and factories, ventilation, sanitation, and safety appliances for machinery, are also strengthened and made more uniform.

The measure thus covers a wide field, and one that offers immense opportunity for dispute. The Government is understood to be prepared, however, to accept modifications wherever agreement can be reached as to the best means for remedying recognized defects in the present laws. It is confidently hoped in government circles, therefore, that the long delay which has occurred in the tackling of this complicated question will not be further protracted beyond the present session.

Philippine View On Independence Told

realistic Filipino political leaders. But it is highly doubtful whether such an arrangement, which could be criticized on the ground of carrying responsibility without authority, would commend itself to American public opinion.

Independence Hopes

Much may happen in the restless Pacific before 1946. It is obviously impossible at this moment to forecast with any certainty the balance of power in this part of the world in the middle of the next decade. Half a dozen conceivable developments, a decisive showdown in Soviet-Japanese relations, for instance, a successful national resurgence in China might perceptibly alter the factors which must now be weighed in surveying the future. of these green, palm-fringed tropical islands.

But at the moment the idea of political severance from America at the appointed time still holds the floor. I could find no convincing proof either that a majority of the politicians, publicists and other makers of Filipino public opinion were prepared to abandon their long cherished ideal of national independence or that America would be in a mood to extend military and naval protection to the Philippines indefinitely without exercising any sovereignty there.

Independence will unmistakably demand both a political and an economic price. The political price is probable further curtailment, possible exclusion of vitally important exports in the United States market. What are the prospects that the Filipinos will be able to meet these demands and retain political, economic and social stability?

Concentration of Power

A very significant feature of the first year of the Commonwealth regime has been the immense concentration of executive power in the hands of the President, Manuel L. Quezon. There is only one political party of serious consequence in the Philippines, and that party, during the last session of the unicameral National Assembly, passed just the laws which Mr. Quezon desired it to pass. A number of the larger towns, such as Cebu, Zamboanga and Davao, have been made chartered cities, with the result that the mayors are appointed by Mr. Quezon, instead of being elected.

The police force has been nationalized and withdrawn from local control. A board of censorship, headed by the Secretary of the Interior, Elpidio Quirino, sees to it that nothing objectionable to the higher authorities goes on the air. Another feature of Philippine administration which is mildly reminiscent of European dictatorships is the establishment of a national board of information, to acquaint the people with the activities of the Government. Unfriendly critics might see in the activities of such a board propaganda, rather than information.

Mr. Quezon was elected President for a term of six years and, under the Constitution, is not eligible for re-election. But the strong apparatus of centralized government which he has built up is likely to outlast him. It is one of the most significant developments of the first year of the Commonwealth. Other significant events are the amazing boom in gold and, to a lesser extent, in other minerals, which may portend an important shift in national economy; the launching of a big national defense scheme, under the advice and sponsorship of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, former chief of staff of the United States army; and the attempts of the Government to meet the problem of social unrest by a combination of prompt and severe repression of persons and groups accused of subversive activities with constructive labor and agrarian legislation.

Broadly speaking, most Americans, as well as most Filipinos, with whom I talked pronounced the record of the Commonwealth during its first year satisfactory. But of course the Filipino ship of state is still in harbor, protected by the double breakwater of American political sponsorship and American economic preference. Its real test as to seaworthiness can only come in the next decade.

LaGuardia And Son Open Bridge In Brooklyn

Mayor F. H. LaGuardia and his young son, Eric, recently pulled the electric control that opened to traffic the new Washington Avenue Bridge over the Wallabout Canal, in Brooklyn.

The bridge, which connects the Navy yard and Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, was described by Raymond V. Ingersoll, Borough President of Brooklyn, as part of an extensive improvement to Brooklyn's traffic arteries which he has projected.

"This bridge, with the Meeker Avenue Bridge, which we hope will soon be open," continued Mr. Ingersoll, "will speed up transportation between Brooklyn and Queens long before the World's Fair is opened."

Mayor LaGuardia praised Mr. Ingersoll and Frederick J. H. Kracke, Commissioner of Plant and Structures.

The bridge is of the jacknife or bascule type and was built with the aid of Federal funds. It is estimated that 14,000 vehicles and 500 street cars will pass over the bridge daily.

Mr. George Hirose, the well known baritone, who will appear again at the Nippon Gekijo.

GEORGE HIROSE AT NIPPON GEKIJO

George Hirose the baritone whose characterization of "Ol' Man River" from "Show Boat" was so well received at the Nippon Gekijo will appear again at that theater commencing Sunday, March 21. "Ol' Man River" is a far cry from oratorio, a field in which Mr. Hirose has distinguished himself. For some years he was soloist at the Central Congregational Church in New York City, the largest church of that denomination in America and of which the late Dr. S. Parkes Cadman was the minister. It was the custom of the choir at Central Church to present an oratorio or cantata once every month during the fall and winter season. This experience served Mr. Hirose to good advantage when, later on, he appeared as soloist with various oratorio societies and choral clubs. Just a year ago Mr. Hirose was heard for the first time in Gilbert and Sullivan opera. He sang leading baritone roles at the Majestic Theater in New York City in the same company with such patriarchs as Frank Moulan, Herbert Waterous and William Danforth. When he is not singing at the Nippon Gekijo or other theaters of the Takarazuka chain, Mr. Hirose is acquiring knowledge about Japanese music and musical instruments. Because of his keen interest in any endeavor that may bring before western audiences the culture of Japan, Mr. Hirose plans to go to America in 1939 for the purpose of another lecture-recital tour. This time, however, he will surround himself with dancers. This company will give programs of music and dances of Japan using native instruments. Much of Mr. Hirose's time has been spent in teaching, both at his former studio in New York and at the Purcell School of Music in Montclair, New Jersey.

Air-mindedness, Trend In Hawaii

HONOLULU, Hawaii—Air-mindedness of both residents and vacationists in Hawaii is indicated by the arrival here of a new "baby clipper" for the air service that connects Honolulu with the outlying islands of the group. This air liner, a 16-passenger Sikorsky amphibion, is the third such plane to be added to the Hawaiian cross-channel flying service in a little over a year.

While the between-the-islands service has been operating steadily for more than seven years, the recent establishment of a trans-Pacific route has stimulated Hawaii's enthusiasm for commercial aviation.

The increase in tourist traffic to Hawaii and a growing interest in the vacation attractions of the islands of Kauai, Maui and Hawaii, have been other factors in the growth of the air traffic from Honolulu to those islands. Modern steamers maintain regular sailings to the outlying islands, but many tourists use the baby clippers to have time and to get a plane's-eye view of Hawaii's rugged, volcano-sculptured scenery.

Sit Down Strike Of Hula Girls Is Latest Report

HONOLULU, Hawaii.—A sit down strike of hula girls has been reported here.

The report, an erroneous one, was traced to a group of newly arrived tourists, whose lack of knowledge concerning an old Hawaiian custom, caused them to misinterpret a performance staged in their honor.

Interpreting the hula from a sitting or kneeling posture has always been one of the accepted forms of the famous dance. Among these are the hula puili and the kuolo. The latter is carried out to the rhythmic pounding of a double calabash, accompanied by chanting or song: while the dancers in the former wield split bamboo rattles. In this the performers are usually placed in two rows facing each other, thus favoring responsive actions in the use of the instrument and the cantillations of the songs.

Face, eyes and arms play a major part in the interpretive gesturing of the dance, hula experts point out, and thus very little of the grace, beauty and import of the dance is lost in the "sitdown" or kneeling hulas.

The real hula as it is danced in Hawaii is a graceful, interpretive dance telling the legends and heroic stories of the Islands. It has nothing in common with the sideshow version frequently seen away from the Islands. The oldtime hula was, in fact, an institution of religious origin.

The hula is the dancing poetry of the Islands—an artful combination of music, pantomime and dance. Men as well as women can dance it, and many members of the vacation colony are enrolling in hula instruction classes. While some cellophane hula skirts are seen at Honolulu performances, most of the dancers contine to weave their own from the leaves of the ti plant.

To Train Foreign Service Men To Study Trade

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WARM SPRINGS, Georgia, March 17—On a vacation here, President Roosevelt today received newspapermen and revealed that he and the American ambassador to Paris, Mr. William C. Bullitt who is accompanying the President on his vacation, had discussed the possibility of establishing a Government academy in Washington in order to train foreign service officers to specialize in the study of commercial and agricultural subjects. No further explanation of the project was made by Mr. Roosevelt.

ENTERTAINS AT LARGE ENGAGEMENT PARTY

Mrs. Edith Kawasaki entertained Sunday her friends at her home in Aoyama 1-chome to announce the engagement of Miss Margaret Himeko Nishikawa and Dr. Edward Hironose Kuwabara. The guests were entertained with music during the early part of the party. Mrs. Alexander George was first on the program and she sang Romance, from the Desert Song; the Yellow Dog; the Indian Love Call and I love you Truly. She was accompanied by Mrs. Agnes Makiyama. Then Miss Shizuko Gunji, a pupil of Mrs. Kawasaki's, played Waltz by Durante and Karatachi no Hana by Yamada. The next number was given by Miss Grace Sumida who sang At Dawning, The World is Waiting for the Sunrise. Master Hiroshi Hatoyama then gave three violin selections. First he played Le Cygne by Saint Saens, then Souvenir by Franz Dordora and last Karatachi no Hana by Yamada. He was accompanied by Miss Setsuko Ota. After the program cards announcing the engagement of the couple were distributed as a surprise among the guests by Miss Sally Thomas and Miss Jean Ford who were dressed in Japanese clothes to the tune of Mendelssohn's Spring Song.

Tea was served in one of the rooms downstairs and the pourers were Miss Gardiner, Miss Lade, Mrs. T. Matsuwa and Miss Mary Murai. During the tea the guests were entertained with two Japanese dances by Miss Sumie Kugimoto, who is seven years old.

The tokonoma was appropriately decorated with a beautiful bonkei arrangement by the famous Mr. Tomomichi Isona, master of the art. The arrangement was horaizan, which means land of Eternity. The kakemono hanging in the Tokonoma was one with crane design on it meaning long life.

Miss Nishikawa, will leave Japan for Los Angeles Thursday where she will visit her mother before going on to Canada. Dr. Kuwabara, will leave Japan Thursday, April 1 and go straight to Canada where the couple expect to be married.

JAPANESE ENGLISH SPEAKING STUDENTS ASSOCIATION

The committee of the Japanese English Speaking Students Association has received an invitation to the Fourth Annual Convention of the Japan-American Students, which is scheduled to be held at the Stanford University, California, in August. The third convention was held at the Waseda University, Tokyo last summer and promoted the goodwill relations between Japanese and American students.

Mr. Richard Watson, chief of the committee and Mrs. Elenor Hadley, chairman are requesting the Japanese committee to send some 50 students as Japanese delegates to the next convention. It is said that all the universities and colleges of the United States will send their representatives to the next convention. The Japanese English Speaking Students Association has started to make preparations according to the invitation. A meeting was held last Friday when the Japanese committee discussed the program for the convention.

Hoover Calls For 'Hands Off' Supreme Court

far deeper and more far-reaching in purpose than these details."

Says Revision Is Intent

In the light of background, Mr. Hoover said, "no one can conclude other than that the President seeks to secure a Supreme Court, not that will find in accordance with the Constitution as it stands, but rather that will revise the Constitution so it will mean what he wishes it to mean.

"And this is not a loose assertion. Mr. Roosevelt himself specifically confirms this purpose. In his message to Congress he says that if these proposals be accepted, then 'we will be relieved of the necessity of considering any fundamental change in the powers of the courts or the Constitution of our government.'

"If this is to be accomplished the new judges must necessarily be men who will ratify Mr. Roosevelt's projects. Unless they are pledged to Mr. Roosevelt's way of thinking, he would not be, to use his own words, relieved of the necessity of considering fundamental changes in the Constitution.

"I am wondering what esteem these pledged judges would hold with the people.

"If Mr. Roosevelt can change the Constitution to suit his purpose by adding to the members of the court, any succeeding President can do it to suit his purposes. . . .

"The court and the Constitution thus become the instrument of the Executive and not the instrument of the people."

Psychiatrist Hails Roosevelt As Ideal

President Roosevelt, in the eyes of psychiatrists, is a truly great leader, for his leadership is born from a rare human virtue, "the love impulse," rather than the "destructive" desire of self-aggrandizement which is the characteristic of most persons in places of power and authority, says the New York Times.

This was the message given to the fourteenth annual convention of the American Orthopsychiatric Association at the Hotel Roosevelt, New York City by Dr. John Levy of the Department of Psychiatry of Columbia University and staff psychiatrist of the Brooklyn Juvenile Protective Association. Dr. Levy, who read a paper on human relationships, cited to reporters the example of President Roosevelt as personifying the qualities of leadership he had in mind.

The nation would be saved from the widespread outbreak of industrial strife which has gripped it if employers and labor leaders could emulate President Roosevelt's "tremendously efficient" traits of leadership, Dr. Levy asserted. Most leaders of American industry and business, although boasting 100 per cent efficiency in production technique, are themselves only 25 per cent efficient in their attitudes toward their fellow human beings, he declared.

Treatment for Leaders Urged

Employers, labor leaders and others in authority could approach closer to the ideal of leadership established by President Roosevelt if they were to undergo therapeutic treatment at the hands of expert psychiatrists, which would substitute for their present dominating characteristic of hostility a "spirit to serve and help others," Dr. Levy said.

"In President Roosevelt we have a great leader who is magnificently well adjusted," Dr. Levy continued. "Men are not naturally born leaders. But the President has succeeded in curbing the destructive human traits of leadership, usually expressed in a spirit of unrecognized aggression or hostility, and has developed to a very high degree the constructive traits which make for a great leader.

"President Roosevelt is a first-class leader by the standards of psychiatry because with him leadership is a labor of love. Unlike most employers, he is not dominated by that common destructive force which leads most men to an attitude which says 'see what a great man I am.' President Roosevelt, instead of being motivated by a passion for self-aggrandizement, is moved by a love of his fellowmen and an unusually strong desire to help them. In the light of his motives, his acts represent wholesome aggression. Psychiatrists, therefore, recognize him as a first-class leader."

The real issue of most strikes is not so much a question of hours and wages as it is a fight by each contending party to win for itself the role of dominance while forcing the others into the position of submission, Dr. Levy declared. This lack of harmony between employers and employes represents perhaps the greatest waste in potential business and industrial efficiency, he added.

French Fliers At Karachi

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

KARACHI, India, March 19—With all hopes now completely lost of their reaching Tokyo in record time, Mr. Antoine Pissavy and Georges Cornet, French fliers, of whom nothing had been heard since their arrival at Damascus on March 13, unexpectedly landed here at 7:45 p.m. today.

Upon arrival, the French airmen announced that they intend to take off for Johdpur tomorrow.

Higher Taxes Due To Follow Naval Races

money. Otherwise, like the British people in grim determination to protect themselves, there is nothing to do but accept the additional burden.

The most discouraging features of naval expansion at present, as always, is the financial aspect. In the present situation that aspect is serious not only in the matter of actual expenditures and an increasing burden on taxpayers, but also in its indirect effect upon the general financial situation.

British Program

Although the claim does not agree with the indicated proportion of borrowing to contemplated total outlays, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer states that three-fourths of the British program will be borne directly by the British taxpayers. That proposition is to be considered in connection with a national budget which is not only balanced but is expected to return a surplus and one can agree, to some extent, with Mr. Chamberlain's statement that the British government can borrow with a clear conscience, because it has restored such confidence in British finances that they "are the envy of the whole world."

On the other hand a similar program in the United States must be undertaken in the face of a current year's deficit half again as large as the total borrowing proposed by the British government for its entire program and with the prospect of a deficit in the next fiscal year of substantial proportions in spite of all optimistic estimates to the contrary. It must be undertaken in the face of heavy drafts upon the Treasury for flood relief and the tremendous program necessary to prevent future flood disasters; large contemplated outlays for slum clearance, housing and other extraordinary public works; and the outlays for unemployment relief contemplated by Harry Hopkins.

The financial position of the United States in this matter is exactly what was to have been expected as a result of its enormous and wasteful expenditures for relief and recovery. It is fortunate that in the circumstances it faces only a rearmament program instead of an actual war.

For the United States increased armament presents the issue of all immediate increase in taxation. The trend of continued deficit financing, for whatever purpose, is so definitely in the direction of inflation that a necessary increase in national defense outlays would seem to be a good time to call a halt and give serious consideration to a policy of pay-as-you-go in expenditures for at least the ordinary costs of government of which national defense is a part

Bureaucracy Held Education's Peril

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 20.—A rapidly growing danger to American higher education through the encroachment of State Legislatures into the administrative affairs of universities and through the acceptance of Federal subsidies by these institutions was described by speakers today at a joint meeting of the American Philosophical Society with representatives of organizations administering research funds.

In the face of observations, offered at an earlier session, depicting America as relatively free intellectually as compared with some European countries, Dr. Alexander G. Ruthven, president of the University of Michigan, warned that genuine threats to "academic freedom and institutional independence" were "developing on our horizon." His viewpoint was supported by Dr. Frank Aydelotte, president of Swarthmore College.

"Our universities are facing a crisis," Dr. Ruthven said. "I wonder if you realize that only two of the State-supported institutions are free of supervision by State agencies, including the State Legislatures, says the New York Times.

"This situation has had an astonishingly rapid rise in the last ten years. I mention it simply to develop the further thought that day by day we see the Federal Government taking over more supervision of State-supported education."

Reliance In Trust Funds

He said that Federal subsidies were having the "insidious effect" of putting many State-supported schools to a greater extent under the supervision of "small bureaucrats in Washington." Asserting that if the trend continued it would reach endowed colleges and universities, he added:

"It is not only good sense, but absolutely necessary to the preservation of our system of education, for privately endowed schools to adopt a coordinated plan of higher education and exert some leadership rather than drift with the tide."

Stating that "if the privately endowed schools are to be free to develop their own programs they must have the cooperation of the foundations," he urged "some sort of general cooperation between the foundations for giving aid and suggested that "the foundations work with the various councils in forming the leadership."

Following the session he named the University of Michigan and the University of Maine as the two State-supported universities which had remained free of "attempts at regimentation and remote control."

Dr. Aydelotte said that the "terrible danger" confronting American education was felt so strongly at Swarthmore College "that we refuse to let our students accept Federal subsidies."

He had urged this step, he explained "to teach the students self-reliance and try to break this vicious chain of relying on the government for everything."

"The very freedom of endowed universities," he added, "has affected the freedom of State universities and, if the endowed institutions give up, they can no longer bolster the State schools."

Question of Grants-in-Aid

The question of the value of grants-in-aid to research workers as compared with scholarships and fellowships was a focal point for discussion participated in by representatives of foundations, learned societies, academies and universities and by research workers themselves.

As a result of an endowment of about $4,000,000 left by Dr. R. A. F. Penrose, the Philosophical Society has become a type of operating foundation itself and, with about $200,000 available annually for the purpose, it has begun giving grants to aid research.

Dr. Ruthven had said that grants-in-aid to colleges were the "least valuable assistance that can be given."

Arguing for scholarships and fellowships, he warned that after a man receiving a grant had worked a year or two on a project it loomed so large in his mind that he was "bitter" if the grant was cut off. The man, rather than the project, should be emphasized, he contended.

Defending the fellowship plan, Dr. W. F. G. Swann, director of the Bartol Research Foundation of the Franklin Institute, said that a quarter of a century ago this country was one of the most backward in physics, but that National Council fellowships had put it in the forefront of the world in experimental physics and had advanced it to a place near the front in mathematics.

Moreover, Dr. Swann declared, this progress had been made at less than the cost of a battleship.

To the expressed surprise of Dr. Edwin G. Conklin, vice president of the American Philosophical Society, Roland S. Morris, the president, announced his personal "tentative conclusion" that gifts-in-aid were the "most dangerous" type of assistance to research workers, and that fellowships, "while a distinct gamble, are the most valuable that can be given."

"Perhaps we may decide we can do better work by establishing, perhaps, the Benjamin Franklin Fellowships of the American Philosophical Society," he said.

Dr. Conklin said he agreed with the "importance of these post-doctoral fellowships" but that he "did not dream that the American Philosophical Society was in a position to compete, with, let us say, the Rockefeller Foundation." He invited members, however, to express their opinions on the subject in writing.

A tendency by some organizations to shift the emphasis in research work from the physical to the social sciences and the humanities was noted by several speakers, including Dr. Warren Weaver, director of natural sciences of the Rockefeller Foundation, who said there was a conviction "that the physical sciences have outrun the life sciences."

The Rockefeller Foundation itself, he related, had felt, partly because of reduced income, that it was better not to try to cover all the fields of activity, but to narrow its program somewhat. With this in mind it had endeavored to "choose fields in which knowledge has some bearing upon the welfare of mankind."

WELCOME MEETING FOR COUNT VISCONTI

A welcome meeting in honor of Count Guido Carlo Visconti, Rotarian, and a well-known personality in the realm of music in Italy, is being held under the auspices of the Japan Rotary Club of Tokyo, at the Koyokan Restaurant, Shiba Park, at 7 p.m. April 1. Count Visconti will arrive shortly on an unofficial visit to Japan. The sponsors of the meeting are Mr. Jokichi Asabuki, Mr. Sen Mochida, Mr. Yoshikiyo Oshima and Baron Yasushi Togo. The Italian Ambassador, Mr. Giacinto Auriti and Baron Michele Scammacca, counsellor to the Italian Embassy in Tokyo will also be guests.

Guido Carlo Visconti was born in Milan on 13 July, 1891. Even as a child he showed a remarkable talent for music, but his father did not want him to adopt music as a career and he was sent to the University of Genoa where he studied law and was graduated with a unanimity of votes. He did not give up his music, however, and while he was still at the university he continued his musical education under such masters as Menozzi, Frugatta, Coronaro, and Martucci. He became a conductor of note and the founder of several orchestral associations, among them the "Milan Symphonic Concert Society". But he was not alone famous as a conductor. As a pianist he toured Italy with his own orchestra, bringing to the attention of the Italian people many compositions which were unknown or little known before. During the world war he served as a first lieutenant and as a captain of cavalry. After the armistice, he placed his services at the command of the state. At present he is vice president of the "Istituto Nazione Fascista di Cultura", and as a lecturer, writer, composer, and artist he is engaged in propaganda work for the Italian State. He is also president of "Leonardo" of Florence and holds many other important positions in industrial concerns and public institutions.

Count Visconti has been very active as a Rotarian. He joined the Rotary Club of Florence in 1926 and is a past president of that club. As president of the club he organized the district conference in 1933. He was governor of the 46th district of Rotary International for 1935-36, and was re-elected for 1936-37.

One Way Passage Triumphs At Hibiya

will they have the courage to take it?

We'll not spoil your enjoyment by revealing the unexpected ending.

Kay Francis and William Powell are ideally cast. Against the tragic hopelessness of the situation—Powell's jaunty lightness of manner stands in vivid contrast. There is, too, a mellow richness in his performance that shows how close real comedy is to the tragic.

The dark, sparkling beauty of Miss Francis has never been more effective and the exquisite simplicity of her portrayal gives to the character of Joan a poignant reality.

Warren Hymer as Sergeant Burke of the San Francisco police—and Powell's nemesis—does the best acting of his career. Aline MacMahon strikes a new vein of humor as the lady like crook who goes under the name of "The Countess' and she has an able confederate in Frank McHugh. The two provide the comedy relief so necessary to offset the intense drama of the main story.

Tay Garnett loses no possible effect in his direction and Robert Kurrle's photography magically creates the sound necessary to the drama.

From the moment the audience is introduced to the Long Bar in Hongkong to the final sequence, after the ocean passage, on New Year's Eve in San Francisco—the picture never loses its suspense nor its air of inevitability.

"One Way Passage" is a picture no lover of great drama should fail to see.

Puzzlers Mystify Tyros With Stunts

Without solving any of the eternal mysteries, delegates to the 107th semi-annual convention of the National Puzzlers League at the Hotel New Yorker devoted themselves not unsuccessfully to a series of minor perplexities.

Men and women who called one another everything from Archimedes to Streptococcus for the occasion—all riddlers have cryptic names—competed at double crostics, punned with or without reason, held a weird spelling bee and in general bewildered all tyros among them, says the N.Y. Times.

The timeliest element of the program was provided by Ab Struse, a mild youth of 24 who ordinarily answered to the name David Shulman and lives in the Bronx. He presented an "anagrammatic sonnet" based on the theme of, and the twenty-nine letters in, "Washington Crossing the Delaware." It follows:

When across General wish'd train t' go,
He saw his ragged Continentals row,
The cold waters swashing on in rage,
Redcoats warn slow his hint engage.
A hard, howling tossing water scene
Strong tide was washing hero clean.
"How cold!" Weather stings as in anger;
O silent night shows ware ace danger.
He stands while crew sit, an oar going,
And so this General watches rowing.
He hastens—Winter again grows cold,
A wet crew gain Hessian stronghold.
He goes astern; alight O crew and win!
George can't lose war with 's hands in!

It was difficult not to be impressed by such a tour de force, especially when it was declared that each line consisted of a different arrangement of the same twenty-nine letters.

But at the same time perfectionists were quick to point out that there was a superfluous R in line one, and an extra I in line nine. Some one even dared challenge Mr. Shulman this way: "Did you ever see a sonnet anywhere else made up of seven couplets?"

Ab Struse looked hurt and parried: "I'm sure of that—I looked it up somewhere and it's a Shakespearean sonnet."

He was informed that the only couplet in the type mentioned occurred in the last two lines, the others rhyming ababcdcd.

"Well, then," the puzzler insisted, "it's a Petrarchan."

He could not be upset on the rather anachronistic "train" in line one. "Just a synonym for army," he said.

Like Gelett Burgess, who admitted, after printing an algebraic word puzzle on the blackboard, that it had its tiny flaws, Mr. Shulman conceded his masterpiece had "some leaks." He also agreed with Charles Jacobsen, who as Oedipus pointed out that lines two, three, five and twelve of the alleged sonnet had been used individually before.

"I'd still like to see any one else do better," were Ab Struse's friendly last words, and no one chose to challenge him.

Phyllis McGinley, Will Irwin and James F. Morton, vice president of the league, were judges at the double-crostic battle, which took up most of the afternoon. Mrs. Elizabeth C. Moore of 9 Gramercy Park won the finals after having finished first in a preliminary round. Her time was seventeen minutes flat.

Maurice Simons of 1,940 Andrews Avenue, the Bronx, was second and Mrs. Mazie S. Fisher of 174 West Seventy-six Street, third.

At the outset Mr. Irwin announced: "We shall judge this contest without fear or favor—corruption shall be useless. In this period of controversy over the Supreme Court, judges have to be above reproach." Then he added: "We're all over 70."

During the spelling bee, later, it was often observed that the double-crostic referees might well have served to help out those who attempted to decide the bee, for breaches of certain time-honored rules were rather frequent. When C. Saw, otherwise Lewis Trent, began to argue a technicality on behalf of the New York riddlers' team, Presiding Justice Albert A. Griffin of Swansea, Mass., rebuked him with: "You ought to be Saw C. instead."

There were sectional meetings and a gathering of the Mystic Minute Men. Mr. Burgess contributed the first public showing of his home-made nonsense machine, a device that goes through all sorts of three-dimensional gyrations to no apparent purpose. A good time was had by all, including those few outsiders to whom the whole thing was a puzzle.

12PC Rise In Wages Is Won By 135,000

One hundred and thirty-five thousand members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America will receive a wage increase of 12 per cent. or $30,000,000 annually, under the terms of a three-year contract approved on February 19 by the Amalgamated and by a committee of men's clothing manufacturers, representing 85 per cent of the national industry, with a retail production volume of more than $1,000,000,000, according to the New York Times.

Between 35,000 and 40,000 workers in the metropolitan district will benefit from the contract, which becomes effective May 15. Continuation of the thirty-six-hour work week is provided in the agreemetn, the first negotiated on a national scale in the history of the industry.

Hillman Hails Agreement

Sidney Hillman, president of the union, an affiliate of the Committee for Industrial Organization, hailed the agreement as a victory for the C.I.O. principle of industrial organization in the mass production industries.

"In the negotiations for a general increase in wages," Mr. Hillman said, "the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America represented all the workers in the industry and thus was able to speak authoritatively on behalf of all the workers to the organized employers in the industry.

"Those who are associated with this industry realize that no effective organization of labor would be possible if workers in this industry were divided into craft organizations, each representing a small group of skilled mechanics. Nor could a national agreement have been negotiated for the whole industry without an industrial organization of labor, speaking for all the workers in the industry."

Mr. Hillman disclosed that the union, which had originally asked a 15 per cent increase in pay, had rejected the thesis that the amount of wages should be determined by fluctuations in the cost of living.

"An increase of wages was asked for and gained on the basis that the workers in the industry are entitled to a larger share of the fruits of their industry," the union head declared, "a share that will enable the workers to live on a higher standard of life. It was not just a question of meeting the increased cost of living.

"In other words, the Amalgamated demanded for its members a real increase in the purchasing power of each worker. Unless all industry does the same the improvement in business cannot continue. The employers with whom we are in contractual relations have shown the economic intelligence to recognize this also."

He estimated that the increase in "real wages" under the new scale would be 7 or 8 per cent. This figure was obtained by comparing the 12 per cent pay increase with rising living costs.

Unorganized Workers Aided

The new agreement will cover some 20,000 unorganized workers. It will apply to workers paid by the week and to those employed on a piece-work basis. The amount of the increase to be given cutters will be decided by a special committee of the union and the manufacturers. Mr. Hillman predicted that the cutter scale in this city would jump from $50 a week to $55.

He said that the three-year contract gave either party the right at the end of each year to call for new negotiations on the question of wages. All other considerations remain static.

A joint statement issued by Mr. Hillman and Bertram J. Cahn of B. Kuppenheimer & Co., Chicago, chairman of the manufacturers' committee, declared that all the conferences between the two groups had been conducted in "a spirit of harmony."

It was this aspect of the negotiations that Mr. Hillman stressed in his personal comment on the contract. He pointed out that the industry's record of amicable collective bargaining dated from 1911, when the union negotiated an agreement with Hart, Shaffner & Marx. Since then there had never been a strike in any plant where an agreement was in force, he said.

"In the midst of industrial strife," Mr. Hillman declared, "there is an industry which amicably negotiates on all questions. Though the month or more of our current discussions there were no scare headlines of a strike. We knew that some basis of settlement would be found."

The committee of manufacturers that Mr. Cahn headed included Morris Greenberg of Hart Schaffner & Marx, Chicago; Max Holtz, president of the Rochester Clothing Exchange; Henry J. Ettelson, president of the Philadelphia Clothing Manufacturers Association; Frank Zurn of the Alco Zander Company, Philadelphia; Louis Goldsmith of Philadelphia, Charles D. Jaffee, president of the New York Clothing Manufacturers Exchange; J. H. Levy, Boris Maruchess and Mark Trivison, also of the exchange; Victor S. Riesenfeld of Cohen, Goldman & Co., N. Schwartz of Julius Schwartz Sons; Morris Friedman Company, Raymond H. Reiss of the International Tailoring Company and David Drecheler, counsel.

Representing the union, in addition to Mr. Hillman, were the following vice presidents: Louis Hollander, Joseph Catalanotti and Murray Weinstein of New York, Hyman Blumberg of Baltimore, Charles Weinstein of Philadelphia, F. Rosenblum and Samuel Levin of Chicago and Abraham Chatman of Rochester.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

Gordon Is Dead; Chief Of Clan, 'Cock of North'

LONDON, Feb. 20.—The Marquess of Huntly, chief of the Clan Gordon, Premier Marquess of Scotland, who was known as "the Cock of the North," died today at his home, Orton Hall, Peterborough. He was eighty-nine years old.

The marquess's first wife, the former Amy Cunliffe-Brooks, died in 1920. Two years later he married Mrs. Charlotte Macdonald, of Cincinnati, widow of James Macdonald, of the Standard Oil Company.

There were no children to either marriage, but in 1927 Lord and Lady Huntly adopted two American orphans, Isabelle and Marjorie Meuser, grandnieces of the Marchioness.

Called Handsomest Peer

Charles Gordon, Marquess of Huntly, during his eventful life, lived up to the reputation of his historic Scottish clan, whose members were known as the "gay Gordons." Often called the handsomest and most courtly peer in Great Britain, he served as a lord-in-waiting to Queen Victoria, and was a member of the Privy Council under three sovereigns. Lord Rector of the University of Aberdeen and commander of the Bodyguard of Gentlemen-at-Arms.

He was one of the first to advocate the so-called "national coalition government," which was formed in August, 1931, under J. Ramsay MacDonald, to combat the national emergency caused by the depression. On May 21, 1930, during a debate in the House of Lords, Lord Huntly moved an amendment to a motion by Viscount Elibank dealing with the depression. The amendment was: "That it would be of great advantage to the state if the leaders and representatives of all parties were to meet in conference to consider the necessary and remedial measures to be taken by an agreement on non-political lines."

In a letter to "The Daily Telegraph," which Lord Huntly wrote a month before the formation of the coalition government, he said: "While the country is bleeding to death, living on its capital and heading straight for national bankruptcy, the consideration of party tactics over-rides the nation's needs. We should sink our differences in an effort to get rid of questions which are most pressing."

Was Keen Huntsman

He was a keen follower of the hounds all his life, and rode until he was past seventy years old. Although he inherited an estate of 85,000 acres, with an annual rent roll of $100,000, he was frequently in financial difficulties, and twice was declared bankrupt.

At a hearing in June, 1898, in London Bankruptcy Court, Lord Huntly's debts were shown to be $698,490 and his assets $3,450. Thirty years later, during the same month, a receiving order in bankruptcy was issued against him on a creditor's petition, according to The Associated Press.

Lord Huntly was born on March 4, 1847, at Orton-Longueville, the third of the tenth Marquess of Huntly's fourteen children. His family, the clan of Gordon, was from the north of Scotland, and one of the most powerful in Scottish history. Although the Gordons were not of Celtic origin, like the McPhersons, the McKenzies, and other Highland clans, they held an outstanding position in the Highlands for more than 500 years.

Several hundred years ago the prestige of the Gordons caused a member of the English court to describe the clan leader as a "Cock o' the North, whose wings should be clipped." The nickname stuck, and every Marques of Huntly since that time has been known as "Cock of the North."

Lord Huntly said that his first clear childhood recollection was of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, on "a gloomy November day in 1852." The day was very wet, he recalled, and a pool of water gathered in the hall of his parents' home from the dripping plumes of the guests. Another early recollection was of his grandfather, who boasted at ninety-two that he had danced with both Queen Marie Antoniette of France and Queen Victoria.

After finishing his studies at Eton Lord Huntly entered Trinity College, Cambridge, but persuaded his family to allow him to go hunting in India, rather than begin his third year at college. He traveled widely in the East, but returned to England to be married on July 14, 1869, to Miss Amy Brooks, the daughter of a wealthy provincial banker.

Long and Happy Marriage

The marriage took place in Westminister Abbey, with the Prince of Wales and other leaders of London society attending. It was a happy marriage and lasted until the Marchoiness of Huntly's death in 1920, despite some ill-will between Lord Huntly and his somewhat hot-tempered father-in-law. The banker objected violently to his son-in-law's fancy for "plunging" at the races and left most of his property to a grand son by another daughter.

In 1922, Lord Huntly married Mrs. Charlotte Isabelle Macdonald, of Washington, who inherited a fortune of $2,000,000 from her second husband, James Macdonald, an official of the Standard Oil Company. After their marriage they leased Aboyne Castle, ancestral home of the Gordon family, and entertained many members of American society there.

World Oil Supply In Canada Is Seen

The existence in Northern Alberta, Canada, of a tremendous oil reserve of between 100 billion to 250 billion barrels, which offers assurance that the world is safe from possible early exhaustion of its oil supply, was reported recently at the closing sessions of the annual meeting of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, at the Engineering Societies Building, 33 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York City, says the New York Times.

Only about 1 per cent of the smaller estimate, or about one billion barrels, is of immediate economic importance, it was pointed out. The reason is that the new oil reserve is mixed with thick sand and will have to be mined in shafts, thus making it considerably more costly to obtain than through petroleum well recovery.

The report was presented by Max W. Ball of Edmonton, president of Abasand Oils, Ltd., who credited S. C. Ellis, Dominion Government authority, with the statement that there are at least 100 billion barrels of oil in the sands of the McMurray District of Northern Alberta.

C. P. Bowie of the United States Bureau of Mines, Mr. Ball said, put the estimate at 250 billion barrels, which would be equivalent to four times the known petroleum reserve of the world as estimated by the United States Geological Survey.

Deep Shafts Necessary

In most of the area, Mr. Ball added, shafts 800 to 1,200 feet deep would be necessary to reach the deposits, and timbering costs, added to the cost of shafting and hoisting, would be great. The oil is too viscous to flow and apparently is not backed by gas or hydrostatic pressure.

However, Mr. Ball said, the Athabasca River and some of its tributaries have eroded valleys down through the overlying formations, exposing the oil sands. Along the sides of some of the valleys the streams have left benches of oil saids that can be mined by open pit mining equipment, except the hydraulic type. Workable deposits within reasonable distance of transportation are estimated to contain 500 million barrels of oil, which would be added to the immediate reserves of the oil industry.

Representative Samuel B. Pettengill of Indiana, in an address recently before the dinner of the Petroleum Division of the institute, at the Hotel Commodore, warned the petroleum industry to set its house in order and thus avoid forcing the government to take drastic steps, which, when taken, would mean the end of free enterprise and of democratic institutions.

"In general it seems plain," he said, "that industrial statesmanship must do as much as political statesmanship can promise—and more! The industry and the oil States must have a record of actual accomplishment in the public interest so impressive that argument for the nationalization of the industry can find no substantial support.

Enterprise Held Discredited

"Free enterprise is now discredited, not by open advocates of State socialism, but by business men themselves—particularly those in finance. They have done it two ways—indefensible conduct in their own fields of activity, and second, by rushing to Washington for special privileges for themselves or legislative handcuffs for their competitors.

"If capitalism is destroyed in this country it will be chiefly an inside job. It will die in the home of its friends, its death-wound given by its beneficiaries and not by its foes. A critical examination of the wolves in business is far more necessary than a scrutiny of Rexford Guy Tugwell, Norman Thomas or Earl Browder."

Petroleum, along with such recognized public utilities as railroads and electricity, Mr. Pettengill added, is "in the front line trenches of private enterprise." The "zero hour" for these industries, he said, "may be no further distant than ten years."

The rule of capture was held responsible for despoiling America's vast resources of petroleum and natural gas in a paper by Earl Oliver, consulting and appraisal engineer, of Ponca City, Okla.

Dr. Paul D. Merica, vice president of the International Nickel Company, spoke of the possibilities of psychiatric treatment in Summer camps.

Dr. George J. Mohr of Chicago was elected president of the association. Others elected were Miss Emma Olson of Evanston, Ill., vice president; Dr. Norvelle C. LeMar of New York, secretary, and Dr. George S. Stevenson of New York, treasurer. The next annual meeting will be held in Chicago on Feb. 24 to 26, 1938.

Delinquency Laid To Stern Mothers said.

"The mothers are women who more or less despise adult males and feel themselves capable, superior and in control, while the fathers have been quite content to accept this position and are depressed, submissive, disinterested, not only in their own lives, but those of the children," Dr. MacDonald said.

Present Difficult Problem

These boys, she said, present a difficult problem as far as treatment is concerned and since little can be done for them under ordinary clinical conditions. She recommended their segregation and extended treatment in special hospital schools. She said there was need for small institutions combining the experiences of home, school and clinic to be used exclusively for the study and treatment of such children.

Dr. Lauretta Bender and Adolph Woltmann of the psychiatric division of Bellevue Hospital described in a paper the use of plastic material as a psychiatric approach to emotional probelms in children. Joseph Galkin, assistant director of the Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls School, a corrective institution maintained by the Jewish Board of Guardians, delivered the fourteenth Howe Memorial Lecture on the subject, "Progress in the Improvement of Cast Iron and the Use of Alloys."

US Army Studies Model Mississippi

off a small flood, say the 1935 flood, and keep the books straight and the letters answered.

The model itself has been described in the Herald Tribune in some detail. Briefly, its wonders are almost beyond imagining. It is made of stucco and concrete and hardware wire to represent water, river bed, river banks and forests, and it is the product of one of the finest pieces of imagination ever to come out of the War Department.

Flood in Miniature

A man has seen the huge, wonderful Missiasippi basin in flood. And now, here, before his eyes, is the whole thing again. It is perfect. Its functions are identical with the river. It has the fascination of any model, and its purpose is to save life and property. Yet the cost was less than $4,000, which would buy two Marne-to-Paris shells, capable of destroying Pennsylvania Station or six companies of foot soldiers.

"We find a lot out here," says the guide. "We get to know, after running off a model flood, if there is such a thing as a model flood, how much silt has been deposited and how much carried down stream. For instance, we know that about eight inches of top soil in the Ohio Valley was carried away from the farms of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky by this flood because we know how much was carried away by flood heights of 1927.

"Soon we will know that if there are, let us say, fifteen inches of rainfall in one month along a certain Mississippi Valley river, there will be a flood in that valley so high that it will inundate so much land and force us to build levees to a specific height. We will know how long before that water comes down to the Mississippi, and where it will spill over its banks. We will know how much soil will be carried away, and perhaps how many trees have to be planted to help prevent the rapid run-off, although reforestation, for all the talk, is not a great deal of help actually in preventing a flood.

"We should know where to build reservoirs at the head-waters of the streams that pour into the Mississippi, so we can hold back water when there is too much of it, and preserve it for use when the Mississippi River is a ten-foot trickle.

West Pointers in Charge

"Our station is operated by First Lieutenant Francis H. Falkner and Second Lieutenant Oliver S. Haywood. Both are young West Pointers who know mathematics and are here on temporary assignment. We don't ask for much, but I think we give a great deal that is worth while information.

"I hope you can see the thing when it is all finished in a couple of years. There is no other model like this in the world except in Berlin, which is smaller because, naturally, the Rhome and the Rhine are no Mississippi. The Mississippi is a great river, you know. It is an enormous thing. It is on a scale in grandeur with the Himalayas, or the Rockies, or the Amazon, or the Arctic and Antarctic, or the sight of the skyscrapers on Manhattan from the bay.

See Man As Whole, Dr. Carrel Urges

N. Y. Times

URBANA, Ill., Feb. 21.—If our present civilization is to survive, man as a whole must be understood by science, Dr. Alexis Carrell of the Rockefeller Institute of New York told a University of Illinois audience today.

The surgeon, who is a Nobel Prize winner, came here to receive the Cardinal Newman Award for 1936, honoring his contributions to medical science. The Rev. Dr. John A. O'Brien, director of the Newman Foundation, made the presentation.

Science has analyzed man in his many aspects and activities; now a synthesis should bring together these many studies, said Dr. Carrel in his address on "The Need of a New Knowledge of Man."

"Man has misused science and technology, and has created a world inimical to himself," he said. "The crisis it not a passing disturbance in the growth of nations. It is the crumbling of civilization itself.

"Our troubles, therefore, are rooted in the very structure of modern society. They cannot be cured by the remedies advocated by economists and statesmen. Prosperity, war, faith in a dictator, or good-will among democratic people will be equally inefficient."

Only science, for the first time in history at the disposal of mankind, makes it possible that our civilization will not vanish into dust even though our time displays "an alarming resemblance to the past," Dr. Carrel went on.

Time to "Resume Ascension"

"Science, in its conquest of the world of inanimate matter, has proved its strength," he said. "It teaches us that we must obey natural laws and not blindly follow the dreams of sociologists and philosophers.

"It supplies us with the means of gaining mastery over our body, our soul, and our environment, that is, with the power of remaking our selves, as well as our institutions. In this country, catastrophes are not as imminent as in Europe. There may still be time, if we have humility, courage and wisdom, to stop our downward course and resume our ascension."

It is imperative to deal in realism, not abstractions, he continued, saying:

"Man differs profoundly from the abstractions created by economists, social workers, psychologists, physiologists, educators, historians, and other specialists.

"Each man is inseparable from his surroundings, and these surroundings are bound, in the last analysis, to social and political institutions. Such a concept is based on observational acts.

"Unfortunately, modern society has turned its attention exclusively to the dissection of man. It has isolated him from his cosmic and social environment. Then, it has separated the soul from the body.

"The body has been divided into blood, cells and organs. The soul has been neglected in the analytical process. In this manner, many sciences have been constructed, each having one of the aspects of man as its object.

"But this fragmentary knowledge has not been coordinated into a science of man. The essential characteristic of such a science is to be synthetic as well as analytic, that is to embrace man in his totality."

Proposes "Institute of Man"

Man as a whole should be the study of a new institution, Dr. Carrel declared. He proposed that this new center of synthetic thought be called "institute of man," or "institute of civilization," and view man, not as an abstraction through the eyes of a specialist, but as "the individual, a physiological and spiritual whole bound to his environment."

"Industrial civilization has committed the sin of developing specialists exclusively," said Dr. Carrel. "It has starved out of existence those who are interested in the relations of several departments of knowledge. There is an imperative need for such men."

As broad aspects of the purposes and program of the proposed institute of man, Dr. Carrell gave the following:

From birth to maturity man must be molded into a definite organic and spiritual form by physical, chemical, physiological, intellectual, moral, religious and aesthetic agencies. For the education and vocation direction to succeed it would be necessary to define the main types to which the individuals composing the nation belonged. The science of human typology is still in its infancy. The individual must be considered in reference to the race.

In the more highly civilized nations, Dr. Carrel said, the propagation of the best strains has decreased in an alarming manner. A close study of the conditions necessary to such propagation must be undertaken.

Typology, environment, causes of criminality, nutrition, the influence of factory life, the nervous and character effects of education must be studied.

"It should be a fundamental rule that, before being applied to human beings, any mechanical invention, philosophical doctrine, diet, mode of living, economics, political or social legislation, educational system, etc., should be scrutinized from the point of view of its effects on the individual as a physiological and spiritual whole bound to his environment," Dr. Carrel stated.

A citation read by George A. Barr of Joliet, Ill., member of the Newman Foundation's executive board, praised Dr. Carrel for pioneer work in developing a technic for transplanting limbs and organs and for the preservation and growth of organs outside the body; for the saving of life by discovery of the Carrel-Dakin method of treating wounds; for research, and for his writings.

or Dostoyevsky at his greatest, or a magnificent piece of music. It is even more wonderful than these in flood, and terrible, too."

That was quite a speech, and it seemed to wear out the guide. He said Vicksburg expected 10,000 visitors this summer just to see the little river model, which was becoming a tourist fixture. He hoped his enthusiasm would be forgiven, and he seemed surprised that the river model had made the tough old journeyman speechless, too.

Arms Conflict Poses Question: Who'll Lose 1st

that was not enough, for amid the encouraging cheers of Josef Stalin, Secretary General of the Communist party, and Clementi Voroshilov, Commissar for War, the Financial Commissar, Gregori F. Grinko, recommended that the total armaments expenditure for 1937 be raised to 20,102,000,000 rubles, an increase of 35 per cent for the year.

Germany's Condition

In Germany, after three years of rapid rearmament, conditions are certainly in some repects much better and in other respects much worse than during the economic blizzard. Rearmament has added to the difficulty of obtaining sufficient imports of food and raw materials, and many more restrictions have been imposed, not only on money but on manufacturers, farmers and shopkeepers. On the other hand, unemployment has been much reduced, and most of the trades, including shipbuilding, are fairly busy.

The armaments expansion has been financed with great skill by Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, who has been able to fund a good deal of the floating debt and to maintain German exports. For the moment it looks as though Germany can keep up the pace without extreme hardship or embarrassment longer than Japan, Russia or Italy.

As to Italy, all we know for certain is that after devaluing the lira by more than 40 per cent, Premier Benito Mussolini has been forced to impose a capital levy and to permit a big rise in the prices of the necessities of life. The Ethiopian drain continues; there is a large deficit on the ordinary budget, and the extraordinary budget is being covered by banking credits, issues of paper money and other mysterious devices. The poverty of the population increases, and there is no obvious means of relief except through a drastic reduction of unproductive expenditure in Italy and Africa.

Lastly we come to France, and we need not go beyond the budget discussions in the Chamber of Deputies to learn how precarious is the situation in which the French government finds itself as a result of an enormous deficit mainly due to the immense and ever-growing cost of the army, navy, air force and frontier fortifications. The not very competent Finance Minister, M. Vincent Auriol, after confessing to a deficit for the current year (which will have to be raised by loan) of 36,000,000,000 francs, sought to excuse it by saying that for several years past the annual additions to the debt had averaged 25,000,000,000 francs.

The one hope seems to lie in an amicable settlement of Germany's colonial grievances in connection with a limitation of armaments and a relaxation of trade restrictions and high tariffs which prevent expansion of European commerce.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Toughest Steel Knife

Frank Richtig, an enterprising and inventive village blacksmith of Clarkson, Nebraska, has perfected a knife of steel which is so hard that he can cut large buggy axles up to an inch and a quarter thick, automobile axles, wagon tires, cold tool steel heavy horse shoes, farm machinery parts, heavy railroad spikes track bolts, and most every kind of steel, cast iron, and wrought iron. And, Believe It or Not, after hammering these knives through these heavy steel and iron pieces, the knife edge is still undamaged and can cut a piece of newspaper. The blade of the knife is exactly like that of an ordinary butcher knife—about 1-16 of an inch thick and one inch wide.

Further Howlers

Our history-books must be rewritten. A manual published today shows us that we have been wrong about the past. Consider Julius Caesar. These are some of the newest disclosures of Mr. Cecil Hunt:

Caesar was a great Queen, and one day she htought she was going to be captured, so she poisoned herself.

Caeser was a Roman Admiral, who landed in Britain about 54 B.C., but he had a tough struggle, and it was not until 45 A.D. that he really made peace.

Caesar was warned to beware of the Ideas of March.

Julius Caesar visited England regularly from 130 B.C. to 554 B.C.

The book in which these startling pieces of information have been collected is by Mr. Cecil Hunt. He calls his work "Further Howlers."

Obscene Literature Definition Wanted

Whatever the outcome of the suit against "A World I Never Made," it has placed James T. Farrell among the literary elect whose works have been prosecuted for obscenity. The list is a long and glittering one, including Mark Twain, George Bernard Shaw, George Moore, James Joyce, Branch Cabell, and, posthumously, Aritophanes, Rabelais and Shakespeare. The roster also includes purveyors of "French postcards" and the publishers of sex magazines. The laws against indecent literature in the United States are broad enough to include them all.

Had "A World I Never Made" come before the courts of an earlier day, there would have been little doubt of the verdict. At the time when the perfumed circumlocutions of "Jurgen" were banned, Mr. Farrell's bluntness might have expected but short shrift, says the New York Herald Tribune. However, though the laws have changed but little, public opinion has grown vastly more tolerant in the last fifteen years, and, to quote from the decision of former Magistrate Jonah J. Goldstein on Flaubert's "November": "The task of the judge is to record the tides of public opinion—not to emulate King Canute in an effort to turn back the tides."

Section 1141 of the State Penal Code, under which the Vanguard Press, publishers of Farrell's book, is being prosecuted, has been on the statute books since 1884. It makes it criminal for a person to have in his possession with intent to sell, lend, give away or to show "any obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, indecent or disgusting" book. Obviously, the case against any book will depend on the interpretation of this "spectrum of adjectives."

Intent Also Considered

In dismissing the case against James Joyce's "Ulysses," Federal Judge John M. Woolsey gave the legal definition of obscenity as something which tends "to stir the sex impulses or to lead to sexually impure and lustful thoughts." He went on to say that the law should concern itself with the reactions of normal persons. But in the case of the People vs. Seltzer in 1924, a New York court held that Section 1141 looks to the protection, not of the mature and intelligent, but of the young and immature, the ignorant and the sensually inclined.

Another element entering into judicial consideration of books accused of obscenity is the intent and sincerity of the author. Earlier decisions tended to rule these features out of court, but they have been prominent in almost all recent cases. Magistrate Nathan D. Perlman, for example, in deciding a year ago that Andre Gide's autobiography, "If It Die," did not come under the penalties of the law, said: "Gide does not extol his temporary departure from virtue; he does not deride virtue. In a sense, the book is a piece of special pleading for pardon, in the nature of counsel's speech for clemency."

Former Magistrate Benjamin E. Greenspan passed Erskine Caldwell's "God's Little Acre" on the basis that truth should always be a justification for literature.

Literary merit has also been taken into account in judging the moral effect of books. The opinions of literary critics have been offered in evidence and weighed by judges. In banning Jim Tully's "Ladies in the Parlor," Magistrate Goldstein remarked: "No subject is in itself indecent. The indecency lies in the manner of treatment; therein lies the difference between literature and smut. Balzac, Boccaccio, De Maupassant, Rabelais and Chaucer made outstanding contributions to literature—less talented pens would have produced filth as distinguished from literature."

Conflicts of Opinion

In dealing with such imponderabels, it is inevitable that conflicts of opinion should arise, and the court careers of some volumes have been checkered and various. "Female," for example, by Donald Henderson Clarke, suffered many vicissitudes before it was finally banned by the Appellate Division of the New York State Supreme Court. The book was first haled before Magistrate Guy Van Amringe, who not only dismissed the charge, but complimented Mr. Clarke on his style. Then a bookseller in Queens was brought into the Jamaica Court of Special Sessions, charged with renting the work.

The Queens justices were less tolerant than the Manhattan magistrate and the bookseller was fined. He appealed, but the Appellate Division affirmed the conviction in a decision which is interesting in that it shows in condensed form some of the principles that guide the decisions of the highest state court in matters of this kind. The opinion of the justices admitted that the interpretation of the statute was difficult and open to many differences of view.

Nevertheless, the opinon went on, "there does emerge, somewhat hazily, the rule that an obscene book is one that 'tends to corrupt the morals of youth' or 'to lower the standards of right and wrong, specifically as to the sexual relations.'"

Then the justices examined the book itself and concluded:

"In our opinin, it is obscene, lewd, lascivious and disgusting and nothing more, and was so intended to be for purely mercenary reasons."

Customs Regulations

Section 1141 is not the only one under which purveyors of indecent literature may be prosecuted. Books from abroad may be stopped at the customs, and, until 1930, there was no appeal from the fiat of the Collector of Customs, except to the Customs Court. By the tariff act of that year, the Secretary of the Treasury was given the power to admit certain books on the banned list, and in contested cases, appeal was permitted to the United States district courts. This would place the burden of proof on the government, and has resulted in such decisions as that permitting the importation and circulation of "Ulysses."

The Post Office Department also concerns itself with literature under a law forbidding the posting of "every obscene, lewd or lascivious, and every filthy book, pamphlet, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent nature."

Any one mailing such literature, or receiving it, knowing its contents, may be prosecuted in the Federal courts.

In theory, three nets, with meshes of varying widths, are spread to catch literary offenders against the moral code. At the customs, obscenity is the only test. The Post Office Department must consider, as well, whether a book is lewd, lascivious or filthy. And, under the penal code of New York, the quality of disgust is added to those for which a book may be prosecuted. This threefold net would be sufficient to give the producers and importers of literature prolonged headaches if the materials of which it was composed were rigid and inflexible. But, with the elastic nature of public opinion necessarily included, the legal aspects of publishing and bookselling have become well-nigh unpredictable.

Vast Arms Plan Voted By Italy For Home Defense

ROME, March 2.—The Fascist Grand Council voted early today, after a long night session, to throw all Italy's resources into creating a war machine capable of defending Italy against any adversary, says the New York Times. This was to show that Italy does not accept Britain's self-appointed role as the policeman of Europe, but wishes to retain her present rank as a military power of first importance.

The military measures of the Grand Council may be summed up in the following five points:

First—Realization of the plan for further increases in the armed forces.

Second—Prolongation for five years of the duties assigned to the Commission for War Manufactures.

Third—Total militarization of all the nation's available men between the ages of 18 and 55 with periodical recalls to the colors of the classes subject to mobilization.

Fourth—The attainment of the highest degree of independence as far as materials necessary for military purposes are concerned and even the total sacrifice, if necessary, of all civil requirements to military needs.

Fifth—An appeal to science and technicians to collaborate toward the prompt attainment of this independence "since only by means of science, valor and a spirit ready for any events are peoples less blessed with wealth capable of resisting eventual aggression from countries rich in money and possessed of great natural resources."

Reply to British Arming

It cannot be doubted that the council's decision to redouble efforts to bring Italian military preparedness to the highest possible pitch and to seek economy independence is a direct reply to Britain. The council served notice on the world and on Britain particularly that Italy does not intend to look on passively while Britain's armaments assume such proportions as to overawe all Europe.

The council reaffirmed Italy's solidarity with the Rebel forces in Spain, the victory of which it regards as a foregone conclusion. The resolutions were preceded by a long, exhaustive report on the armament situation in which Premier Benito Mussolini came to the conclusion that "any possibility, however remote, of armament limitation must now be excluded" and by an equally long, exhaustive report on the international situation in which it is believed Count Galeazzo Ciano, the Foreign Minister, dwelt at length on Italy's great interest to prevent bolshevism from establishing itself on the shores of the Mediterranean.

Italy's reaffirmation of solidarity with the Spanish Rebels is a political manifestation of first-rate importance because it carries the implication that Italy, despite the London non-intervention committee, is resolved to do whatever is necessary to secure General Francisco Franco's triumph. The resolution adopted by the council follows:

The Grand Council of Fascism expresses its solidarity with Nationalist Spain and salutes General Franco's armed forces, whose victory must represent the end of any Bolshevist aspirations in the West and the beginning of a new epoch of power and social justice for the Spanish people who are bound to the Italians by century-long ties of language, religion and history.

The council praised the activities of Count Ciano as Foreign Minister and approved the Italo-German understanding, the Italo-British agreement of Jan. 2, "which represents a useful clarification of the relations between the two countries as far as the Mediterranean is concerned," and the Italo-Turkish conversations at Milan on Feb. 4.

Democratic Powers Blamed

The Italian press comment on the council's decision was mostly aimed at laying at the democratic powers' door responsibility for the present armament race. In the Giornale d'Italia, Virginio Gayda says Italy intends to follow a foreign policy of utmost clarity and therefore is arming. The council's resolutions, he asserts, "are not accompanied by any dramatic expression of alarm or reaction."

"They do not announce," he goes on, "colossal plans prompted by intentions of intimidation. They contain no reference to political ideas that must be defended by the force of arms or to interests which must be imposed on other nations under the false appearance of being great and lofty principles. The Italian measures have not abandoned their contact with reality and will progressively be attuned to the means of war prepared by all other great world nations."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Mushidi—Father Of 910 Children

My statement is based on Pere Labouchere's book "Vingt Ans au Kongo." Father Labouchere spent twenty years as a missionary in the Kongo. In his account of Mushidi, the King of Budkey, he devotes considerable space to tell of this astounding number of children, and also the great number of wives. The number of wives could not be ascertained with accuracy but "they probably numbered 5000." As Mushidi was a vassal King of the great Sova (Ruler) of Loanga, he was obliged to pay an annual tribute to his overlord. This tribute consisted of several hundred wives, which he had to deliver to the Sova each year. Mushidi was arrested by the Belgian authorities and tried for the murder of 27 of his wives. He was found guilty and executed in 1905.

Madrid, Malaga Owe Their Fates To Intervention

bably that Malaga would have been taken without the Italian contribution in infantry and the Italian and German bombardment by land and sea airplanes.

The Madrid Government has been twice saved by foreign aid. It was the arrival of the new Russian material in airplanes, tanks, and artillery, as well as the example shown by the International (XIth) and later by the International (XIIth) Brigade that saved Madrid at the beginning of November. Throughout that month foreign material, mostly Russian, continued to muster in the Madrid sky. In the January offensive against El Pardo, north of Madrid, and perhaps also the February offensive against the Jarama, south of Madrid, the brunt of the fighting was borne by international volunteers. They had been recruited by an international organization, the Communist Party.

There can be no doubt that foreign military aid first came from Italy and Germany. The Savoia airplanes which crashed in French territory in July were given their flying orders only July 17, before the revolt began, and the German bombers began to arrive at the beginning of August. At about the same time, but not on French initiative. 18 French airplanes were supplied to the Madrid Government. Other German and Italian fighting airplanes were supplied to Franco after the fall of Badajoz. All these interventions in Spanish affains were made before the Non-Intervention Agreement was signed on August 28; technically, therefore, they were normalized by that act, and intervention in the terms of the agreement only takes place after that date. After August 28 and until (probably) December Germany does not stand convicted of technical intervention; nor does France. Italy does, for she sent artillery with Italian regimental personnel to Spain in October. But on the whole in this period the rhythm of intervention moves from Germany and Italy to Russia.

Throughout October Russia poured material into Spain, north and east, until the effort of the Fascist Powers was equalized. All her airplanes and tanks and artillery arrived now. Her contribution was paid for out of the Spanish gold reserves, of which the Madrid Government was legally the proprietor. The Italian and German contributions were paid for partly by cash, partly by trade agreements, such as that enabling the German firm Hisma to take the stocks of the Rio Tinto copper mines, and partly by political agreements. One at least of the latter is known, in which General Franco promises Italy never to engage Spain in international measures—i.e., "sanctions"—against her, and not to permit shipping hostile to Italy to use Spanish harbors.

Drafting of Volunteers

October was also the great period of volunteering in France for the international column. It was obvious that Italy and Germany would react. Some time about the end of November more German fighting airplanes arrived, as well as 40 more Italians of the same class. And from this time on observers in Spain noted that the two Powers were beginning to specialize, the Germans taking over bombing and the Italians fighting. The Italians also aided the insurgents at sea by watching on their behalf the movements of vessels from Russian ports. About eight of the latter were taken into insurgent ports or sunk.

Germany and Italy also supplied men, to counter the international column. But first it appeared that only Germany was sending men. Her volunteers, raised from the German Army, in whose barracks the Spanish war was advertised, arrived in three batches. In October, SS motorized specialists; at the beginning of December and finally at the beginning of January, infantry. Altogether between 12,000 and 15,000 men were sent by Germany in great secrecy. Except for specialist and for the few hundred Italians under Rossi who invaded Majorca in September and recaptured the island of Iviza, only 2,500 Italian volunteers entered Spain in 1936, at the beginning of December. From January 1 until the middle of February, however, Italy has poured 40,000 men into Spain, fully equipped with rifles, ammunition, grenades, machine-guns, motors, lorries, and petrol, and paid from the fatherland. They are recruited and organized by the Fascist Party. This expeditionary force, by far the largest in Spain, is accompanied by its own seaplanes, and will probably be used on the coast between Malaga and Valencia. There are also 3,000 Irishmen who fight each other in Caceres, under General O'Duffy. A rough figure for the number of foreigners serving under General Franco is 60,000.

The international column under the Valencia Minister of War is far more difficult to calculate. Most have been recruited in or passed through France, but they have never entered Spain in the large organized units sent from Germany and Italy. Certainly no more than 1,000 have entered north-western Spain—from Irun, that is, to the Asturias. Perpignan, ports 12,000; but the official figure published by Valencia is 15,000 and must be taken as above minimum. In detail, it is known that over 7,000 of these men have been serving at Madrid since November, and that there have been other brigades on the Aragon front and near Cordoba. There must, therefore, be at least 15,000 foreign volunteers serving in the front line, and there are certainly reserves training at Albacete and in Barcelona. Sympathetic observers set the figures at 20,000. The figure is necessarily vague, since these volunteers have not arrived in large shipments. An impartial estimate, therefore, would select its fancy between 20,000 and the 35,000 asserted by the enemies of Valencia, certainly an outside figure for those at present in Spain. Repatriations, it is known, have been large, and the total of those who have passed into Spain since the beginning of the war is probably higher. Most are French, next come the German and Italian refugees; there are 900 British, rather more Poles and Czechs, and a smattering of Chinese, Ethiopians—and Irish. They have suffered heavy casualities, for they have held the front line since November. The Italians have only just thrown in their forces, and it is still doubtful whether any Germans, except air pilots and specialists, have actually seen battle.

Unknown "Bobby" Marlene's Hero

Some unknown London "bobby" is the hero of Marlene Dietrich's stay in Europe. His quick thinking and strong arms saved the glamorous star from possible injury at the hands of hundreds of pursuing, shrieking, pushing, souvenir-seeking fans in London the other day.

La Dietrich, who has been filming "Knight Without Armor" in London with Robert Donat, since her departure from Hollywood, following completion there of Selznick International's technicolor picture, "The Garden of Allah," which will soon be showing here, was in dire peril when she attended the premiere of the Selznick film.

As she arrived at the theater, escorted by Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., her car was spotted by the waiting throng. Breaking through a cordon of 20 police, excited girls leaped on the running board, tapped on the windows and tugged at the doors.

With admirers snatching at her silver cloak and velvet gown, Miss Dietrich was hemmed in on all sides, until the unknown "bobby," fearing for her safety, half carried the star into the theater, with Fairbanks helping to clear the way.

London Prepares For Coronation

London Times

LONDON, March 1—English and Scottish county organizers of the Boy Scouts met in conference last week, in London and Stirling respectively, to discuss the distribution of the Official Coronation Souvenir Program at Coronation festivities in cities, towns, and villages throughout the Empire on Coronation Day.

In undertaking this scheme of distribution on a scale never before attempted Boy Scouts have made it their aim to fulfil his Majesty's wish that the official program should be made available to as great a number of his subjects as possible, wherever they may be. Elaborate plans have been made for the distribution of the programs throughout the United Kingdom, so that no part of the country will be missed, and villages and hamlets where there are no Scouts will be served by Scouts on bicycles or in motor-cars. Every Scout selling the program on Coronation Day will wear an official badge.

The proceeds from the sales will go to King George's Jubilee Trust, which is producing the program, and will thus directly benefit the youth of the country, which the Trust exists to serve.

Preparations for the rehearsals of the Coronation ceremony in Westminster Abbey are being made by the Earl Marshal, the Duke of Norfolk. There will probably be a number of rehearsals in different sections to be followed by a complete rehearsal in ordinary attire, and finally there will be a rehearsal in which the participants will wear full dress.

Meanwhile, details of the order of the procession to and from Westminster Abbey are being arranged. So far as is known at present, there will be three distinct sections. The Royal guests and foreign princes and princesses will be the first to go to the Abbey, followed by our own Princes and Princesses. Then will come the King's procession, so that by the time it leaves Buckingham Palace the whole of the guests will have assembled in the Abbey ready to receive their Majesties.

The Catering Employes' Association and Club have addressed to the Prime Minister a letter protesting against "the decision of the Home Office to permit the importation of foreign catering trade workers for the Coronation period." They state that there are thousands of catering trade employes at present out of work, their own organization alone having on its books over 1,500 men registered for employment. A similar letter has also been sent to the Home Secretary, the Leader of the Opposition, the manager of the Hotel and Catering Trades Employment Exchange, and the secretary of the catering section of the Transport and General Workers' Union.

Evangelical Conference

The eve of the Coronation, as already announced, is to be observed as a day of "united intercession and conference," arranged by the World's Evangelical Alliance, at Queen's Hall. The Bishop of Norwich will preside at the morning session, the Bishop of London in the afternoon, and Sir Josiah Stamp in the evening. Speakers will include the Archbishop of Armagh, the Moderator of the Church of Scotland, Bishop Taylor Smith, Sir Thomas Inskip, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, the Rev. M. E. Aubrey, Moderator of the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, and Gipsy Smith. A form of prayer and intercession has been prepared by the Bishop of Norwich, and will be available for use in churches and other gatherings during and after Coronation Week. A choir of 400 will sing sacred music. Letters have been sent to 5,000 clergy and ministers in Greater London asking them to bring the event to the notice of their congregations.

Three lectures on Coronation music, history, and pageantry are to be given on Wednesdays, March 10, 17, and 24, at the Queen Mary Hall, Y. W. C. A., Central Building, Great Russell Street, at 5:30 p.m. The first lecture will be by Mr. Lawrence Tanner, Keeper of the Muniments, Westminster Abbey; the second by Mr. Osbert Lancaster, dealing with past Coronations; and the third by Professor V. H. Hutchinson, Professor of Music, Birmingham University. Tickets for each lecture, at 7s. 6d., 5s., and 3s 6d., may be obtained from the oversea secretary at the Y. W. C. A. Central Building.

Day Off For Railwaymen

The Great Western, London Midland and Scottish, London and North Eastern, and Southern Railway Companies have decided that as many as practicable of their regular staff (which numbers some 560,000) will be given a day's leave, with pay, on May 12, the payment being at ordinary time or day rates. Those who cannot be liberated will be given an additional day's leave with pay on another day, or, if this cannot be arranged, an additional day's pay at ordinary rates.

Because of the heavy traffic expected, the majority of the employes of London Transport will not be given a holiday on May 12. Those who have to work will be paid at Bank Holiday rates. In addition they will receive a day's pay at ordinary rates, or alternatively they may be granted a day's holiday with pay at some other time. Staff not required to work on Coronation Day will be paid for their holiday.

Edinburgh City Council have already approved of expenditure on the Coronation celebrations amounting to £7,550, and the Lord Provost's Committee have now approved further items bringing the estimated expenditure to £10,553. These items included treats to aged poor, cinema entertainments to 10,000 children of the unemployed, gifts to persons in receipt of public assistance, special meals and entertainments in hospitals, the distribution of mugs or medals, ringing of church bells, bands and a platform for dancing, open-air displays by schoolchildren, and a bonfire to cost £200.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

President By One Vote

The presidential election of 1824 yielded no electoral majority for any of the four candidates. Jackson polled 99 electoral votes Adams 84, Crawford 41, and Clay was eliminated with only 37 electoral votes. The election was thrown into Congress, which voted by States on February 9, 1825.

Of the 24 states composing the Union, 12 were for Adams, 7 for Jackson and 4 for Crawford. New York had not yet voted, being evenly divided between the two candidates. The decisive vote for New York was held by General Van Rensselaer, who was opposed to Adams. Under the strong influence of Clay and Webster, who had intercepted him and pointed out to him the importance of his single vote, the General decided to seek divine guidance. He covered his eyes with his hands in silent prayer. When he removed his hands from his eyes, he beheld lying on the floor directly before him a ticket with Adams' name on it. Convinced that this was the answer to his prayer, he cast his vote for Adams, and thus made the latter President of the United States by one vote.

War Perils Alter Belgium's Course

N. Y. Times

By ANNE O'HARE McCORMICK

BRUSSELS, Belgium, Feb. 24—Behind a cheerful and prosperous front, changes of far-reaching importance are taking place in Belgium. The sharp reorientation of external and internal policy now in process tends to strengthen Belgian nationalism while at the same time definitely aligning this strategic buffer country with the "non-alliance States," an enlarging group including the Scandinavian countries, Finland, the Netherlands and Switzerland, which refuse to be engulfed in conflicts of the great powers.

Belgium is expected to follow the Netherlands in declining Chancellor Adolf Hitler's offer of a guarantee of neutrality. The Netherland line that inviolability is a right and cannot be the subject of an agreement is favored here because the Belgians are convinced that events have proved the Netherland course was wiser than theirs.

The Belgian and Netherland Governments are preparing for the coming conference at The Hague of small powers to discuss the lowering of tariffs and trade barriers among themselves.

Trend Announced by King

King Leopold's announcement that Belgium intends to recover full independence of action and in future wars will act as the national interests dictate means the government will not enter another Locarno or sign any pacts for mutual assistance. Steps to dissolve the military ties with France are already in progress.

The new Belgian attitude represents the most striking change that Europe shows today compared with last year. From the Balkans to Finland the tendency of the small nation is to withdraw when it can from the orbit of the big powers and take an independent line. The revulsion of the satellite States from power politics and pacts to a policy of non-alliance and efforts to help themselves is a significant development that is beginning to engage the attention of Berlin, Paris, London and Rome.

All Belgians desire to see the Maginot Line [French fortifications on the German frontier] extended behind the Franco-Belgian frontier. This, they believe, would be the country's best defense against being used as a corridor for German armies, moving west, or for French armies, moving east. In the present state of mind they fear one move as much as the other.

Belgians watch France anxiously because the French influence is so strong that social conflict across the virtually non-existent border is sure to spread here. This is the danger most dreaded today.

Socialist Starts Conflict

A domestic controversy, now raging, reflects the external pressure. It revolves about Paul Spaak, the young Socialist Foreign Minister, who is under fire in his own party because in a statement ten days ago he advocated national Socialism, not the German variety but in contradistinction to international Socialism.

In a Catholic country like Belgium, for instance, he believes socialism should abandon the traditional fight against the Catholic Church and join with the Christian Democrats to form a Labor party representing all forces for social reform. This thesis wins the approval of Catholics and Liberals, but it is denounced as treason to the class war by old warhorses of the Second International like Emile Vandervelde and Camille Huysmans.

In two all-day sessions this week at Socialist party headquarters in the Maison du Peuple these "pre-Fascist" heresies were hotly debated. The significance of the contest lies in the fact that Mr. Spaak represents a growing movement among the younger Socialists.

This movement is a reflex of the Fascist urge to unify and strengthen the nation. In Belgium it is bound up with a desire to assert independence of foreign powers.

"If Belgium were an island its conditions would be excellent," remarked an influential citizen. "We have minimum unemployment, no problems of the rising standard of living that cannot be solved.

"Our devaluation has been carried out skillfully and successfully. In contrast to France, where price rises nullify benefits, our prices ascended so gradually that we have preserved the balance and are still 10 per cent below the French level."

France Arouses Uneasiness

Merchants and manufacturers complain they can no longer buy in France, their chief source of supply, because of high prices and uncertain deliveries resulting from strikes and lowered production. All eyes in Belgium are turned toward France in uneasiness.

That undoubtedly helps to explain the break in the traditional ties and also the present reaction among the Socialists against Peoples Fronts and the corresponding reaction against the Fascist Rexist party of Leon Degrelle. The dominant impulse in the policy of countries like Belgium and the Netherlands is to keep clear of whirlpools caused by powerful neighbors.

'Sit Down' Closes Douglas Aircraft

N. Y. Times

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 23—The big Douglas aircraft plant at Santa Monica stopped production operations today after about 500 of its 5,600 employes began a sit-down strike with a demonstration like that of college football fans between halves of a game.

Douglas Corporation executives ordered "loyal" employes, including women office workers, to stop work and go home just before noon.

The majority of the day shift left immediately. Some went home, while others congregated in groups along National Boulevard, on which the plant fronts, and talked and listened to speeches.

Santa Monica police and the Mayor were notified, but no officers were summoned.

Douglas Urges Avoiding Trouble

Tonight, while several hundred men still occupied the plant, Donald Douglas, president of the company, issued a statement addressed to the men requesting that they "leave at once to avoid trouble arising from any source."

The statement said the men were "trespassing and are illegally upon the company's property," and added that a large part of the work in progress was for the government. It said "serious consequences to yourselves may follow from a further interference with this work."

Demonstration leaders warned the men against any violence, but there were two fist fights, in which police said one man's nose and another's finger were broken.

The demonstration started when some one pulled the main power switch, stopping machinery. Several hundred cheering men began to march about the plant, urging other workers to join in a strike for more pay. As the demonstration proceeded, executives ordered various units of employes remaining at their posts to suspend work. Then came the shutdown order.

Strike leaders said the sit-down had been ordered by the Aircraft Division of the United Automobile Workers of America, C. I. O. affiliate.

The Douglas plant local of that organization yesterday petitioned the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board to call an election to determine whether the union or the Douglas Employes Association should be recognized as collective bargaining agent for all employes.

The union claimed 60 per cent of the workers and said that nine-tenths of the other 40 per cent were members of the Douglas Employes Association.

Men Urged to Remain

One of the strike leaders, William Busick, an organizer of the Ladies Garment Workers Union, told the strikers to remain in the plant until their demands were met.

He warned them not to smoke or damage any of the company's property, told them their automobiles and families would be cared for, that food would be brought into the plant to them later and that the night shift workmen would begin picketing the plant.

The strike demands are for 15 to 25 cents an hour increase in wages that now average from $19 to $35 a week, recognition of the union, straight seniority and reinstatement of two employes the union contends were dismissed because of union activities.

As of Dec. 1 the Douglas Corporation had on its books unfilled orders totaling nearly $24,500,000, including Federal Government orders for service planes totaling nearly $10,000,000.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Justice

There was a clash between the lawyer and the magistrate. The latter ordered the lawyer to sit down, and as the lawyer, being deaf, didn't hear him and went on talking, the magistrate fined him $10.

The lawyer leaned toward the clerk of the court and cupped his hand behind his ear.

"What did he say?" he inquired.

"He fined you $10," explained the clerk.

"What for?"

"For contempt of court."

The lawyer shot a poisonous look toward the bench and thrust a hand into his pocket.

"I'll pay it now," he said. "It's a just debt."—The Watchman Examiner.

Japanese Banks Will Turn Over Silver To China

ing the inauguration of the new currency measures, much had been accomplished during the past year or two towards stabilization of the nation's currency and also that the general relations between Japan and China have been improving steadily of late, the Japanese interests are stated to have finally been brought to agree to the Chinese proposals.

Now that the Central Government has already taken over the greater part of all the silver in the country, the fulfilment of the silver transfer agreement between the Japanese and the Chinese is believed to have no tangible effect on the general financial situation in the country.

Much appreciation of the sympathetic attitude taken by the Japanese in yielding to the Chinese requests is expressed by the general manager of the Central Bank of China, Mr. Si Teh-mou, in a statement issued here at 5:20 o'clock this afternoon to mark the successful conclusion of the Sino-Japanese silver agreement.

Better Relations Seen

"The settlement of the important issue pending for the past year or two will no doubt contribute much towards the promotion of the relations between the financial circles of the two countries," the statement says.

Confirming the accord of views reached between the representatives of the two countries for the immediate release of the silver holdings in the possession of local Japanese banks, the statement adds that the general manager of the Central Bank had a series of talk over the matter with Mr. Keiji Kodama, head of the recent Japanese economic mission to China, while the latter was staying here. The statement also says that the Japanese have consented to part with their silver holdings according to the same conditions that governed similar contracts with other foreign banks in the country.

Is Chiang Preparing To Fight Japan?

been trying their best to provoke him into open warfare, knowing he wasn't ready. They have done things that would have brought any other nation raging into battle. But when his patience and that of his people seemed tried beyond the limit, Chiang has taken a fresh grip on himself, crushed the war spirit relentlessly and gone on—getting ready.

He wasn't going to let go his one-two punch until it had behind it the steam of his millions. A weak punch would mean the end of China—and he knew it. People called him coward, and he said nothing—knowing that his record in the old days, when he often led his troops, would refute the charge. They called him a traitor and he pointed to his record. Pressure groups urged him to fight, to surrender, to bribe, and he only shook his head.

The Japanese, who insist their motives are only benevolent toward China, and who know a good man when they see one, have a high regard for Chiang Kai-shek. The Japanese also overlook few bets. Lately, in the Orient, they have been popularizing the legend that Chiang's forebears were bold Japanese sea raiders who sailed across from Nippon and settled in Ningpo.

Of course, it's "incredible" and "impossible" that China might win a war against Japan—but you never can tell. Impossible and incredible things happen in the Orient all the time.

And if the incredible happened—well, it would be sort of comforting to Japanese "face" to let the world know that, after all, it was really the old Japanese blood, iron and sukiyaki that led China to victory.

Canadians Feel C.I.O. Results

Christian Science Monitor

TORONTO.—Encouraged by the recent successes in the United States, trade unionists in Canada have redoubled their efforts to organize the Dominion's industrial workers and at several points along the labor front the unions have used their ultimate and strongest weapon—the strike—in efforts to win concessions from their employers.

Labor has been reading the newspapers. It now believes that business is on the road back and it is demanding a larger share in the increased profits by having wage-scales, battered low during the depression years, raised to the old level. The strikes in the United States, notably the sit-down of the auto-workers at Flint, which secured higher wages and shorter hours, have undoubtedly provided the inspiration for the militant attitude along the Canadian labor front today.

A few walkouts have been amicably settled, in most cases to the advantage of the strikers, several are now in progress and over the nation's two great transcontinental, transportation systems—the publicly-owned Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway—the threat of a tie-up still looms.

National Poll

A national poll of the 86,000 members of the 17 unions involved in the railway wage dispute is now being taken and the result will be announced at a meeting of the Joint Negotiating Committee at a meeting in Montreal on March 18. Recent developments, including the restoration of the last 5 per cent cut in Civil Service salaries, have influenced the railwaymen in favor of a walkout. Following mass meetings held spontaneously in railroad towns across the Dominion it was predicted by union officials that there would be a 100 percent vote to strike.

The dispute arose when a Railway Conciliation Board handed down a recommendation to restore only a portion of the last 10 per cent given to the rail workers. The unions refused to accept the partial restoration and proceeded to ballot their members from coast to coast. In the meantime the most serious transportation tie-up in the history of the Dominion threatens. There is still no trans-Canada highway and in many parts of the west roads are impassable during the winter months. The railways are essential in supplying many districts with supplies and for long-distance hauling they represent the only system available.

Should the wheels of Canada's locomotives be stopped by a strike it would mean that not only industry but practically every home in the Dominion would feel the force of the blow.
